Flowers for Scorpia

by Xenakis (IceRosesCrown)

Summary

In this Horde-less Etheria, seven kingdoms live harmoniously.
Every year, the princesses of every kingdom host a day of celebration during the last week of the year, beginning with Bright Moon, and ending with Mystacor, where the year is received with a show of magical lights in the sky, visible everywhere on the planet.
However, this year in Dark Edge, it will be Scorpia's turn to handle the preparation, without help from her mothers!
As the day comes closer and closer, the princess' anxiety skyrockets but, fortunately, Perfuma catches her in time…

Notes

First of all:
This is a secret solstice gift for Rose!
When I got their request and saw scorfuma, I couldn't help taking the challenge XD
I certainly hope you like it!!

Second:
As this is a spin-off of another fic I've been writing for a while, I bring some of the relevant clarifications of that other fic over here:
- As there is no Horde, the Fright Zone is replaced by Scorpia's kingdom (her mothers are there too), and according to my investigation the actual name of the place is difficult to discern; the palace we know in the series, called Horror Hall, in MoTU wasn't related to Scorpia and was in a territory called Dark Edge, which I will be using here (I'm going to play with how Scorpia's personality crashes with those names). The place that was Scorpia's territory, would be the Crimson Waste, and while I'm tempted to make it part of her kingdom, it makes little sense. Furthermore, also because there is no Horde, you may remember it was that what Light Spinner used to convince young Micah of helping her; so as it doesn't exist she never performed the spell, meaning Shadow Weaver never happened, and both Catra and Adora are trauma-free [Me, being self-indulgent and rewriting it like I'd like to rewrite my childhood!? Nah, never]

- As Adora and Catra are literally trauma-free as I said above, they have grown in healthy environments, etc, you will notice (or not) that Adora is more diplomatic and Catra is quite stoic
- FYI: All four Best Friends Squad are dressed like in Adora's future vision (but Glimmer is still a princess).

And I think there's nothing more of relevance for this little spin-off

But, it's worth noting: This works perfectly fine as a standalone, you absolutely don't need to read Times Past and Future
The idea is, if you've read it, this will be like looking on a different camera in the same studio, and you'll have like "insider info". If you go read that one after this fic, it'll clarify a lot of loose references made in this fic, but that's it.
They are different things and completely independent readings that can perfectly stand on their own :D

Just gotta add, thanks to the people of the Spop Creative Flex server for hosting this event (hosts being Rose and Cynnamon), and for helping with naming Scorpia's mothers XD

As the annual festivities approached, preparations in every kingdom were in full motion. The last week of the year is celebrated in all of Etheria, each place with its respective tradition, and the princesses host an open celebration for everybody, one each day of the week. All seven days become the most festive of the year, beginning with Bright Moon, and finishing with Mystacor, where the new year is received with a beautiful light show in the sky that can be seen from almost everywhere on the planet.

The celebrations are always opened by Bright Moon, the first to welcome all Etherians who wish to join the parties. And this year, like every other, had been pretty uneventful for the regents of Dark Edge. As they would usually keep to themselves, any drama being related to them was rare; more often than not, they would just watch it unfold from a safe distance…

And so, that evening, as they returned home, the Queens and their daughter couldn't help but discuss the events of the soirée for a bit…

—I'll be honest. I don't know what that was about, and I think I don't want to know…— the white-haired Queen began.

—Oh, I understand. But I'm a bit curious, aren't you?— her wife insisted. —Granted, I don't even know their names, but I know they are related to Bright Moon's royal family!

—Dahlia…

—What!?

—Then you wonder where Scorpia got her personality— she laughed.

—Are you calling me a bad influence!?— Dahlia reacted, pretending to be indignant.

—No, I'm calling you both gossipers— she giggled.

—Aw, Mom!

—What, my Dear?

—Is that so bad?— the Princess shyly asked, joining her pincers before her face.

—I'm sure she didn't mean it that way… Right, Lynda?— the dark-haired Queen immediately said, her tone a bit reproaching.

—Oh, of course it's not bad!— she nervously nodded. —Ah… I just think there were other things at the party far more interesting than whatever was going on with the King's sister!

—Fine, yes, you're right— Dahlia nodded. —I suppose it's good to see our people enjoying themselves…

—Precisely! How often do they enjoy any of the parties other than our own?

—I wonder why…

—So! Speaking of our party… What are we doing this year?— Scorpia decided to ask, too cheerful to notice the tone in her mother's last remark.

—That's a great question— Lynda sighed, eyes closed.

—We don't know— her wife immediately said, looking at the front as they reached the entrance of Horror Hall.

—Wait, what!? Wha-what do you mean?

—Oh, Darling. We're sure you'll do great— the white-haired Queen gently told her, smiling brightly at Scorpia.

—I- Mom, what are you- I have to plan the party!?

—It's about time you start doing it yourself, my child— Dahlia confirmed, smiling too.

The Princess could hardly believe what she was hearing.

She!?

Plan a whole party!?

On her own!?

As her mothers walked inside, she stood there, unmoving, mouth agape, and screaming internally.

Oh, she was done for…

Scorpia could hardly sleep that night.

She tossed and turned, wondering how one even starts to plan a party.

How does one handle guests' seats?

Decorations?

Food?

How could it be calculated how many seats to arrange or how much food to have prepared!?

—Oh, man… This will be terrible!— she eventually let out, frustrated. —And our parties are always the worst— she then recalled, sorrowful. —Will anyone even show up? I mean, the path through the desert is a bit… treacherous— she had to admit, a bit awkward. —Ugh, who am I even talking to!?

Letting out a long sigh, the Princess closed her eyes for a moment, tried to calm down, and got up from bed.

The sun wasn't up yet, but at least the sky was clearing already so there was some light…

Maybe a little stroll around Horror Hall could help her clear her mind!

For sure!

She needed to stretch a bit, get some fresh air, and calmly think this over…

After all, as her mothers had said, she had helped them plenty of times before; now she would be the one in charge, which meant she'd be the one making decisions and giving orders instead of following them.

Deep in thought, she stepped outside and took a big breath.

Alright… she had today to come up with a plan so the next day she'd be able to prepare everything in time.

Perhaps she could get some help from other princesses?

That evening they had Entrapta's party; she could ask for a few pointers…

Oh, no, no, no.

Scorpia let out a groan while walking around the castle, raising her pincers to her head as panic overtook her.

How could she go bother her friends when they all had their own parties to worry about!?

Nope. Not happening.

She could do this.

Her mothers trusted she could do this, for sure, otherwise they wouldn't have entrusted her with this task!

Yes! Princess Scorpia would do it!

On her own…

A few hours passed, and the Queens got up to have breakfast; Scorpia joined them as soon as she realized, and pretended to be more confident than she really was about the planning for the party.

Even so, and probably because they know her, Dahlia and Lynda reassured her and encouraged her to trust in herself.

If only trust alone could help her organize a whole party…

She didn't even know what her people liked!

Well, maybe trust wasn't enough for that, but then that meant all she needed was to interview her people and so she'd know what she had to do.

Fortunately, she had time before the party in Dryl…

After spending all her morning and part of the afternoon awkwardly questioning several scorpioni, the Princess had a better understanding of what her people enjoy, what they think identifies their culture, but no ideas regarding how to represent that with a party…

It was bad, very, very bad!

She wasted so many hours and made no progress!

Once again, anxiety was invading her, when her mother arrived for her.

—Scorpia, Dear?— Dahlia gently called, placing a pincer on her shoulder. —Are you ready for the party? It's almost time…

—Oh! Mother! Yes, yes. I'm ready to go, haha. Nothing to worry about, no— she awkwardly laughed.

—I was told you asked around about what our people like from our parties…

—Yes, I- Well, I'm usually told what to do, so… I don't really have… any idea.

—That's good, my Dear— her mother smiled. —As a princess, it's important that you think about your people first.

—Yes, Mother— she smiled.

—Now, let's get going. Shouldn't leave Mom waiting— Dahlia smirked.

For some reason, they were the first guests to arrive at Dryl.

Were they early?

Did Entrapta receive them out of courtesy?

Oh, man, Scorpia couldn't panic about this too!

Well, she definitely could, it was happening…

—Good evening, Scorp!

—Ah!— the Princess briefly screamed, startled for a moment. —Oh, Perfuma! I'm so sorry, I was…

—A bit nervous, aren't you?— she giggled.

Oh, how she liked that giggle.

Blushing, she nodded —Yeah, again, sorry about that.

—It's quite alright.

—Did you just arrive?

—Yes!

And went to find her immediately!?

The realization made Scorpia blush slightly yet she didn't even have time to awkwardly answer anything before her mothers joined the conversation.

—Good evening, Princess Perfuma— Lydia gently greeted her.

—Oh, good evening, your Majesties— she replied with a smile.

—People are finally arriving, it seems— Dahlia then said, wanting to start a conversation. —And I just saw the King's sister arrive and go almost immediately to join that banished sorceress… I wonder if there will be drama around her again— the Queen laughed.

—The… banished sorceress?— Perfuma asked, confused and a bit awkward now.

—Oh, never heard of her!?

—Ah, there she goes…— Lydia sighed.

—We don't know her personally but since yesterday, many guests have been talking about her. Just a moment ago, I heard that the sorceress is known as Light Spinner, and seems to have a long history of wrongdoings…

—Oh, I- Well, yes, I think I've heard other guests talking about her— the Princess admitted, briefly looking at Scorpia while trying to hide her discomfort. —But I have a philosophy of not judging people based on rumours and would like to meet her myself— she then added, joining her hands in front of her and smiling brightly.

—Well, if what we heard is true on any level…— Lydia scoffed, rolling her eyes.

—She doesn't sound like an agreeable character, Princess— Dahlia insisted. —I mean, why would anyone make up all that bad stuff!? Leaving her people to die, using young magicians in her pursuit of forbidden powers…

—Ah, yes, I heard names…— Perfuma shyly nodded.

—Alright, Dahlia, that's enough— Lynda finally reproached her wife. —I think you're making her uncomfortable with all this gossiping. Scorpia, Dear, why don't you two go for some apéritifs instead?

—Oh, sure! Yes, i-if you want…

—Certainly. I haven't tried anything yet— Perfuma nodded, sighing in relief and reaching for Scorpia's arm.

The scorpioni princess felt her cheeks burn yet pushed the nervousness away and accompanied her to the tables with food.

—Phew— she finally sighed. —I'm so sorry about my mother, she- Hehe, she's a bit…

—It's alright, Scorp. Your mothers are charming.

—Re-really?

—I know they were just trying to, uh, make conversation.

—Right! It's just- I could see how uneasy you felt, and… well…

—Please, don't worry about that— Perfuma assured her.

Her smile and gentle look caught Scorpia in a short trance before she realized she was staring, and she had to force herself to change subjects.

—Should we, uh, taste the tiny food Entrapta had prepared?— she decided to offer, trying to hide her shyness.

—Of course!

The princesses both focused on the food for a bit, trying different snacks of several colors and shapes, until even filling her mouth with food couldn't keep Scorpia from finally blurting it all out.

—My moms want me to plan the party alone! There, I said it.

—What!?— Perfuma reacted, looking back at her in confusion.

—They tasked me with organizing the party, but I have no idea what to do, how to do it, or-or a-anything!— she went on, supporting herself with her pincers on the table, staring down at the food, and taking mouthfuls of air.

—Scorp, are you alright? Calm down, please…

—I'm fine, I'm fine!— she let out, laughing nervously. —I can do it, don't worry. I'll do it all… alone. I have the strength of many princesses, don't I?— she then joked, hiding the pain behind a smile.

—The strength of many… Oh! Wait here, I'll be right back!

—What?

But the Princess was gone.

She followed Perfuma with her sight and noticed her going straight for Glimmer, who immediately teleported away, then went to find Entrapta. They waved at Scorpia, who shyly waved back, and while the Dryl Princess rushed her way, Perfuma went for Mermista. Before they arrived, Glimmer appeared in a blink with Adora and Catra, and disappeared again for a moment.

—That's all of us!— the Bright Moon Princess announced, reappearing with Frosta.

—Alright, will… someone explain what was so urgent?— Adora inquired, glancing sideways at Catra.

—Right. We were in the middle of a conversation…— Catra clarified.

—Of course!— Perfuma nodded, before giving Scorpia a look. —Come on, Scorp…

—No, no… I can't bother you all…

—Ah… I'll explain— she decided. —We have a bit of an emergency, girls. Scorpia's mothers have asked her to organize tomorrow's party on her own.

—Wait, what!?— Glimmer immediately exclaimed. —My parents won't let me organize the party and dump it all on my aunt!

—Well, my moms are… you know… all about independence and self-sufficiency…

—But there's nothing wrong with asking for help when you have little time to do something— Mermista scoffed. —If you haven't done anything yet, it will be virtually impossible to manage, even with all our help.

—Not really! If we divide tasks efficiently, we can get everything done by tomorrow afternoon!— Entrapta assured them, showing them a bunch of calculations in her tablet for barely a moment.

—Alright, so… We…

—No, guys, really! I shouldn't burden you all with this!

—Scorpia, you have less than a day to get it done! You better let us help!— Glimmer immediately insisted.

All the princesses, her friends, nodded with determination.

—Really?

—Absolutely— Frosta nodded, serious. —We're not leaving a fellow princess to struggle.

—Thank you, guys— she faintly smiled, moved.

—Any time, Scorp…— Catra smirked. —We'll go to Dark Edge early tomorrow, alright?

—Yeah, let's go as early as we can so we distribute tasks— Glimmer nodded. —Though I'll probably go without having breakfast because…

—Ah, don't worry about that. You can eat at my place— Scorpia assured her. —I mean, if there's any food you like…— she then added, a bit ashamed.

—Your food is not that bad, Scorp…— Perfuma reassured her, but the expressions of the other princesses said otherwise.

—I mean, can't be worse than raw fish— Mermista quickly agreed, folding her arms. —Don't worry, we'll handle that tomorrow, alright?

—Good, then! You can return to the party— Perfuma gratefully nodded.

—See you around!— Adora and Catra farewelled.

—See ya!— Entrapta exclaimed, before rushing away too.

—It'll be fine, Scorps… Don't stress that much. The idea is to enjoy preparing the party— Mermista pointed out, carefully patting her shoulder before leaving.

—She's right— Frosta nodded. —We're supposed to celebrate.

—Well, it's easy to say when your parties are so popular…— Scorpia lamented, looking away.

—We'll get that fixed— the young Princess assured her, without a semblance of doubt. —I'll be there tomorrow— she concluded, and walked away with Glimmer.

—Thanks…

Being left alone with Perfuma, the scorpioni princess allowed herself to take a deep breath.

—So? Calmer?

—Ye-yeah… A bit— she admitted, with a faint smile.

—That's good— the Princess sighed, placing a hand on Scorpia's shoulder. —I, uh, was thinking…

—Yeah?

—Why don't I return to Dark Edge with you tonight? That way, we can get started with the planification as soon as we wake up tomorrow!— Perfuma proposed, failing to hide a blush.

—You- I- Well, I mean… You really…

—Yes, I mean it.

—But your party is right the next day!

—That's already planned, Scorp. Seneschal can handle putting the last few things in order, and we get everything ready in the morning.

—Oh- That's- Uh, then, o-of course! I-I certainly hope my moms won't mind…

The princesses smiled at each other and blushed as the same thought crossed their minds.

"She's so pretty…"

However, the silence soon got awkward, and Perfuma panicked slightly trying to find something, anything to say.

—So, uh… your mothers are really interested in that woman, the… banished sorceress, huh?

—Oh, Mom isn't a fan, but Mother loves to gossip and she's been the talk of everyone…— Scorpia apologetically explained. —You said you don't know her, right?

—I don't even know how she looks like— Perfuma admitted, rolling her eyes. —So many people talking about her, and only bad things, is starting to get on my nerves…

—You're a really good person, you know?— Scorpia let out, immediately feeling like she made a mistake. —I mean! Like- You really want to know people and don't just believe what others say, and…

—I understand, Scorp— the Princess chuckled. —Thank you for appreciating it.

—Of course!— she brightly smiled, albeit a little ashamed. —And, um… if you want, maybe you could ask, uh, Glimmer's aunt about the banished sorceress.

—Oh, that's- Yeah, you're right. Your mother mentioned her too…— she remembered, unsure now of whether Scorpia was trying to get rid of her.

—Yeah, that…

There it was again.

The awkwardness…

And the misunderstandings.

Convinced now that Scorpia was hinting at her to leave, Perfuma decided to excuse herself and went, in fact, to talk to Castaspella as she suggested, leaving the scorpioni princess alone.

With a sigh, she turned around and focused on the food again.

Eating bite after bite, a while passed soon enough.

Scorpia wasn't really enjoying the party… and, man, she always enjoyed them!

So seeing her brooding like that was quite surprising for those who knew her.

Yet… no one dared approach her.

Only when Perfuma returned was she finally extracted from her thoughts.

—Hey, Scorp! I-is everything fine?

—Huh? Oh, yeah! Of course! I'm alright— she immediately reacted. She absolutely couldn't fool Perfuma, yet the Princess humored her when she asked —So, how was the chat with the sorceress?

Likely, the plumerian thought, Scorpia wanted a distraction, so it'd be a good idea just to tell her what she learnt.

—Ah, it was actually a great idea! That woman, Light Spinner, was with her, so I could finally meet her and ask about… well, all the stuff I've heard…

—Oh…

—Yeah. She admitted it's all true but, the way people said it made it sound worse than it was… I mean, she did leave her people to die, but she was also a teen.

—Oh, really?

—And Glimmer's aunt said she willingly helped Light Spinner with that spell, not… uh, coerced… — Perfuma went on, until noticing Scorpia's expression. —Hey, why don't we take a seat?

Carefully, the Princess guided her to an empty table and they sat together.

—I'm fine, really…

—No, you're not. Please don't try to act tough— she insisted, cupping one of Scorpia's pincers between her hands. —Come on, tell me what's wrong? I… thought you needed a while alone before, but… you only got worse.

—I- No, I didn't want you to leave! But… I thought I was… boring you— she admitted.

—What? I- Oh, Scorp… Of course not…— Perfuma denied, giving her a sorrowful look. —Can you please tell me what's on your mind? I feel like there were some misunderstandings before…

—Ah… Yeah, you're right…— Scorpia sighed. —Sorry, I just- It's silly… I'm still thinking about the party thing— she confessed, ashamed. —You already helped me solve that, I should be enjoying Entrapta's party instead…

—No, no, I completely understand— she immediately assured her, holding her pincer tighter. —You're so worried about the party because you want to make something great everyone can enjoy! But… you worry you may not manage.

—I- Yeah…— the scorpioni princess sighed. —Nailed it…

With a sad smile, Scorpia held Perfuma's sight for a moment before leaning closer to touch foreheads with her in silent gratitude.

—I know you think it's unimportant, but it is very important for you, Scorp. So we'll help you make a great party.

—Ours is the least popular…

—That will change with our help— the Princess insisted, smiling confidently.

Later that night, once the party ended, the Queens of Dark Edge returned home with their daughter and her guest.

They had absolutely no objections, yet perhaps it was because their idea of Scorpia and Perfuma's relationship differed a bit from that of the princesses'.

And it only became evident when it was time to rest for the night.

—So, uh, Mom…— the scorpioni princess shyly began, nervously tapping her pincers together in front of her. —Do we have any-any spare rooms for Perfuma?

—Spare rooms?— Lydia asked, confused, right as her wife approached.

—What about spare rooms?— Dahlia immediately asked, placing a pincer on her partner's back. —I already tidied up the bed. You're not leaving me alone tonight, are you?— she joked.

—Of course not, Love. It's just that Scorpia asked for a spare room for the Princess.

—Why do you need- Wait, aren't you two together?

—Are we what?— she immediately reacted. —Oh- I… wouldn't say so. I-I never- I never really asked her out— she admitted, looking away with a blush.

The Queens exchanged confused glances and seemed to silently reach an agreement.

—Oh, well… It's a shame that there are no spare rooms— Lydia lied.

—Maybe it's a good time to formalize that relationship, Dear— Dahlia smirked, giving her daughter a mischievous look.

Scorpia turned red and held her breath for a moment, her thoughts a complete mess.

Should she?

Was it the right time?

And if her mothers thought they were already dating, did everyone else think so too!?

—I, uh… A-alright. I'll… see what- I'll ask her what she wants to do, then…— the Princess muttered, turning to leave.

—Good night, Dear— her mom farewelled, barely holding a giggle.

—So, uh…— Scorpia began, as soon as she returned with Perfuma, who had remained in the dining room. —My mothers say there are no spare rooms… I-I suppose- I mean, do you mind… well, sharing my room?— she stammered, unable to meet her gaze. —I-I can sleep on the couch, of course! I don't want to-to make you uncomfortable— she quickly clarified, her nervousness increasing.

—The couch? Wait, Scorp, I- Why would I want you to sleep on the couch?— the Princess asked, between pained and worried. But it soon hit her. —Is it because of what happened last time?— she further inquired. But Scorpia seemed reluctant to answer. —Is that why you, um, never asked me out?

—I stung you! I-I supposed you'd be mad at me, a-and how not!? And… then I thought you just wanted to salvage our friendship and that's why you didn't completely disappear— the scorpioni princess finally admitted, her sight fixed on her pincers as she held her tail.

Perfuma had no idea how ashamed she was, or that the incident she had completely forgotten about still haunted her to this day.

—Oh, Scorp… If I had known, I would have told you sooner— the Princess began. —I wasn't mad. And I didn't even remember that until you mentioned it. I-I thought you regretted inviting me to… spend the night with you and…

—Well, yeah, I regretted not thinking I could accidentally sting you— Scorpia grunted.

—That was just an accident— she insisted. —I hoped you would invite me again at some point… — Perfuma then admitted, blushing.

That finally drew Scorpia's eyes back to her, albeit wide open in shock.

—So you… want to be with me? Even if this damned thing might…

—Don't be so mean to yourself, Scorp— the Princess interrupted her. —Your tail is a part of you, and just as beautiful— she gently told her, stepping closer. —And, yes, of course I want. I would have asked you out myself if I had known.

—Oh…

—But we never discussed what happened, you always changed subjects, and I thought you… also regretted our kiss— Perfuma sighed, looking down.

—Absolutely not! I- Oh, man, I can't believe it— Scorpia groaned, letting go of her tail and raising her pincers to her head. —I was so ready to ask you out back then, yet that happened, and I thought I ruined it!

—Are you still ready? Or should I give you some time?— the Princess boldly asked, pushing away her fear.

It rendered her speechless.

The scorpioni's face turned red as her carapace and, just like with her mothers, her thoughts were suddenly all over the place.

But Perfuma patiently waited for an answer.

After a moment, Scorpia took a deep breath, slowly let it out, and calmed down enough to make a decision.

—I am— she nodded, smiling softly. —Would you want to… be my girlfriend?— she finally asked, extending a pincer at her.

The plumerian princess didn't hesitate to take it and seemed on the brink of tears as she replied —Of course, Scorp.

Giddy, the princesses closed the distance and shared a kiss for a moment. Sighing in relief when they broke it, they looked at each other while gently embracing.

—Want to go to sleep now? I'll be more careful this time— Scorpia chuckled.

—Yes, we should. We're waking up early tomorrow.

The next morning, by the time the Queens of Dark Edge woke up, her daughter and Perfuma were already up having breakfast.

—I can get you some… uh, fruit, maybe— Scorpia offered, noticing Perfuma seemed to be forcing herself to eat the weird-looking food they had been brought.

—No, no. It's alright. I'm just… not that hungry, but I know I must eat— she replied, apologetic. —Your food is fine.

—Morning, you two— Dahlia greeted them, as she and her wife arrived at the table. —Slept well?

—Yes, absolutely. Thank you for your hospitality, your Majesty— Perfuma nodded, completely missing the mischievous look of the Queen.

However, this time, Lydia was just as interested…

—Any news you two want to share?

—Ne-news?— Scorpia stammered, glancing back at Perfuma.

—Should we… have any?— she decided to ask, genuinely confused. —We already told you our friends will be coming today…

—Of course, we know that. But we're talking about news pertaining to you two…— Lydia insisted.

—I- No- Oh, wait… Aw, Mom!— the scorpioni princess groaned, finally realizing. As her face turned red, she covered it with her pincers but admitted —Yes, yes… We're… dating.

—Ah!— the Queens celebrated, rushing to embrace them both.

—Finally!— Dahlia happily exclaimed.

—I am so, so glad!— her wife let out, just as excited.

Soon enough, fortunately for the princesses, the Queens let go and sat at the table after ordering to be brought breakfast.

Eager to know more, they were ready to question the couple non-stop, yet before they could say a word, a servant arrived, announcing —Excuse me, your Majesties. The Princess of Bright Moon has arrived.

—Oh, Glimmer is here!— Perfuma exclaimed.

—Ah, yeah, Mom, I told her she could have breakfast here, is that alright? I kind of forgot to ask yesterday…— Scorpia nervously realized.

—Of course, dear. We'll order another breakfast to be brought for her.

They didn't waste a second and immediately began discussing ideas for the party, brainstorming as many options as they could think of. The three princesses seemed to enhance each other's excitement, and they didn't notice how their voices kept getting louder and louder the more they spoke.

However, the Queens saw Scorpia so happy, relaxed, and invested in preparing the best possible party, that they wouldn't dare complain about the noise.

Some of the ideas were… interesting, but perhaps they could work?

For instance, Princess Glimmer suggested changing how their traditional food is presented. The argument was that the food she had just been served looked less than appetizing, and yet, when she tried it, she was gladly surprised by how good it was.

But the more they heard them, the more they liked what they were thinking.

Even if it felt a bit too innovative.

Well, they had decided to put their daughter in charge despite knowing her personality tends to clash with their general culture, and yet… it seemed like letting her be herself without forcing a different attitude on her had been the right choice.

She was finally finding her own way of connecting with their traditions, and they couldn't be prouder of her…

About an hour later, the rest of the princesses were in Horror Hall, discussing ideas and how to implement them.

—Alright. Let's go over it— Adora sentenced. —Mermista and Frosta, you'll handle the food presentation with the cooks since you know the most about that— she began, gesturing at the princesses, who nodded in agreement. —Glimmer, you prepare the decorations in here.

—Yes. Red desert roses— she confirmed.

—Perfect. Entrapta, you will scan the surrounding area to find a safe route between the limits of Dark Edge and here, and Perfuma will decorate it so it's marked for the guests— Adora went on.

—Absolutely! My drones can scan the area in about an hour or two— the Princess of Dryl assured.

—And I'll make a path of green vines with red roses to match Glimmer's decorations— Perfuma added.

—Awesome. Then Catra and I will patrol the area during the guests' arrival to make sure there are no surprises— Adora concluded, glancing back at her partner.

—Oh, guys, thank you so much!— Scorpia finally let out, moved to tears.

—You're welcome, Scorp— Catra smirked. —But don't forget your job is the most important one: supervision.

—Ah, yeah… Haha, I'm not sure… what to do then. Won't be of much help— the Princess shyly admitted, scratching the back of her neck.

—Of course you will! You're the one who knows how to better represent your customs and everything, and if you overlook our work, you can tell us if something doesn't look right or needs to be changed— Glimmer explained. —That'll save us a lot of time…

—In short: you'll have the last word about decisions, you'll call the shots, and we'll do as you see fit— Frosta summarized.

—I see. Alright— Scorpia nodded, more serious.

—You'll do great— Perfuma encouraged her. —Now, we should probably get started! We have about five hours before the party begins.

—Woo-hoo! Let's do this!— Glimmer celebrated, blinking away.

For the next few hours, the princesses dutifully fulfilled their tasks.

Scorpia had little time to stop and catch her breath; she was always needed somewhere to make the final call on how to do something, provide insight on whether the customs of her people were being correctly represented, or make sure things would be according to the scorpioni people's taste.

After briefly stopping for lunch, and testing whether the food the cooks made with Frosta and Mermista's suggestions was both appealing and tasty, everyone went back to finish preparations.

The party was scheduled to begin in about three hours by the time they all rendezvoused, so they had plenty of time to fix anything if the Queens were to complain.

Yes, they had agreed to let Scorpia freely decide, but she insisted on getting her mothers' approval.

—I'm gladly surprised, Dear— Lynda began, after looking around Horror Hall, its surrounding area, and tasting the food. —Everything is… wonderful! I wouldn't have thought of doing things this way, but… it all looks beautiful. You and your friends did a great job.

The Princess was beaming with joy and blushed a bit, looking away.

—Thank you, Mom.

—I agree, yes— Dahlia nodded, serious but satisfied. —And you did it in record time. You should be proud, my child— she smiled. —Now, can we see the tables' assignment for the guests?

—The-the what?— Scorpia stammered, going pale.

—Oh, my… Don't you remember?— her mom asked, surprised. —All prominent guests should always have assigned seats at the tables, according to where they are from or their statuses. You could also accommodate them according to known relationships, if they are family or such, of course.

—The decision is yours, but you definitely need to assign tables for such guests— her mother insisted.

—Oh, we… didn't think about that because not all kingdoms do that— Perfuma apologetically explained. —We just make sure there's enough space available for everyone.

—Right, we don't do it either. Just prepare an area for guests to eat when they please, and another for music and entertainment— Mermista seconded her.

—I should have mentioned it, then— Glimmer realized. —But I couldn't recall whether you did or not. In our case, we do, and so does Mystacor. They go a bit overboard, though. They have everyone on a list with their seat, and then some… extra tables for unexpected guests…

—What about you, Frosta?— Adora asked, now curious.

—Yes, we have the same custom as Dark Edge— she admitted, joining her hands. —I didn't mention it because I thought that was already decided from previous years.

—It normally is, Princess, but since this year the distribution of tables is different, a new assignment should be done.

—And there are… new guests— Dahlia added to her wife's explanation.

—Bu-but… I-I have no idea who counts as prominent!— Scorpia argued, starting to panic. —Or who is related to who, in which way… I only know the titles of some people, but not everyone!

—Oh, I can certainly handle that!— Entrapta quickly assured her.

—Really!?

—I have a complete database of the Etherian royalty and their social circles! It was last updated during my social event yesterday after a little confusion I had, so now I can guarantee a ninety-eight percent accuracy.

—That should be enough— Lydia smiled. —We'll leave you to it, then, and you can show us when you're done.

—Meanwhile, we should get ready for the party— Dahlia said, placing a pincer behind her wife's back to walk away with her.

—Alright, Entrapta. We better start with that list. How many prominent guests would there be?

—Prominent guests add up to…— she began, checking her tablet. —Sixty-seven guests.

—Cool, that's not much— Adora commented. —How many seats should be assigned if we consider their social circles?

—That would be… uh, around a hundred and nineteen.

—Ugh… That will take forever— Mermista groaned.

—Please tell us we can divide the list between us, then— Glimmer pleaded.

—Better even! I can design an algorithm to assign seats and we can check its accuracy to make changes accordingly!— Entrapta excitedly proposed.

—Really!? How long would that take?

—About… half an hour— she guessed.

—Plenty of spare time to check it afterwards and make sure the assignments make sense— Catra reflected.

—Awesome! I'll get started right away!

Shortly before the first guests arrived, the princesses managed to get the tables' assignments approved by the Queens. A few modifications had to be made, some before they revised it, and some afterwards, but it was fortunately done in time.

Entrapta's algorithm proved to be quite useful and shortened times, but… it was far from perfect yet, which the Princess absolutely didn't mind.

The important thing was that Scorpia could finally focus on herself and get ready.

Yet she was… quite nervous.

She had no idea what to wear, for starters.

How had she forgotten about that!?

And what if she had missed something that the guests noticed!?

Oh, no, and the speech! She hadn't prepared her welcome speech!

—Please, calm down, Scorp. We'll help you handle any issues, if there are any, alright?— Perfuma reassured her. —And, about the speech, you just have to welcome people, thank them for coming, nothing else. It doesn't have to be formal or follow certain formulas. Just speak from the heart— she suggested, smiling gently.

—Bu-but what about- I mean, I can't dump everything on you all!

—It's just until you get dressed for the party. You're still the host— the Princess insisted. —And, as the host, it's your time to shine! Why don't you put on that black dress you have? I'm sure it will cause an impression— she giggled.

—Really?— Scorpia shyly let out, blushing a bit. —It's a good dress, isn't it?— she then agreed, looking away.

—Come on, go now— Perfuma ushered her. —We'll be waiting for you and your mothers!

As promised, the princesses handled things while Scorpia was gone.

Between Entrapta and some of the scorpioni servants of Horror Hall, they gradually got all the guests to their tables. The others welcomed their people and encouraged them to mingle, noticing their awkwardness since it would be their first time attending Dark Edge's party.

And so, by the time the regents arrived, they had to hide their shock at the massive attendance.

As most conversations died down, and all eyes fixed on them, Scorpia remained with her mom while her mother stepped forward.

—Welcome to the third day of the End of the Year week— she began, silencing the few people who were still talking. —It is with great joy that I present to you this year's host: our daughter, Princess Scorpia, to welcome you all— she stated, looking back at her, encouragingly.

—Go ahead— Lydia whispered, gently pushing her forward.

The Princess shyly advanced and took Dahlia's place in front of the multitude, yet couldn't find it in her to begin. She only clicked her pincers together, keeping her sight away, until Perfuma caught her attention and gave her a thumbs-up.

Her bright smile finally helped the scorpioni princess relax enough, so she took a deep breath and hesitantly looked up.

So many faces, so many eyes on her…

But she had to do it.

She could do it!

—Em… Welcome! Everyone. Uh… I hope you all enjoy the party today! I-I know it's not the usual style, I…— she stammered a bit as she began, still feeling unsure yet wanting to say something. She looked down again, feeling defeated, and let out a long sigh, closing her eyes. She couldn't do it. At least not like that. After a moment, she looked up again, determined this time, and started over. —I don't really fit here— she stated. —I know everyone thinks I'm nothing like my mothers, or have a personality that makes no sense for the Princess of Dark Edge, and perhaps shouldn't be the host of this party— she continued. —But, I love our culture. I enjoy seeing so many Scorpioni sharing this place with people from all over Etheria, chatting, drinking, and eating together, and I wanted all of you to experience what I have with my friends. We're nothing alike, at first I was even scary to them with my pincers and all—, she laughed. —But we're not that different! It's just a matter of changing our perspective, adapting a bit, giving each other a chance!— she sentenced excitedly. —I called my friends to help me with this party and, thanks to them, we have our customs presented in a way that everyone can enjoy. The decorations are appealing but still show our colors that, oftentimes, come across as dark; our food, which usually seems inedible, was cooked and served so that it looks tasty like other dishes yet retains our typical flavors and ingredients— she explained. —And I know this place is called Horror Hall, but that doesn't mean it has to be scary. Does anyone think the way the room is arranged somehow erases our culture? Because I think it looks really nice, and it's still my home— she remarked. —So… I just wanted to thank my friends, and wish everyone a happy time.

Thunderous applause let the Princess know her speech had been well received, and so Scorpia could join her friends, now relieved.

—That was awesome!— Glimmer beamed. —This party is awesome!

—Literally— Mermista smirked. —And not just because we helped; everyone is talking about it.

—They are, they are— Frosta nodded. —So it is now time for you to hear it from them.

—You mean- I-I have to greet everyone personally!?

—As the host, and friend of many of them, your duty is to greet all guests, yes. At the very least the most prominent ones, and the people you know, of course.

—Oh, man. This is much more tiring than I thought…— Scorpia complained. —But I don't want to be rude, either.

—Then get going— Frosta suggested.

—I'll go with you— Perfuma smiled. —Shall we?

—Yeah, of course— Scorpia sighed, smiling.

From a distance, comfortably sitting at the royal table, the Queens of Dark Edge observed as their daughter briefly chatted with several guests, always followed by Princess Perfuma.

The pair first greeted the regents of Bright Moon. Queen Angella and King Micah seemed pleased with the party and the welcome, and Dahlia couldn't help the surge of pride inside her chest.

Afterwards, they came across Sea Hawk, with whom a really loud conversation began as he and Scorpia hyped each other up. Fortunately for everyone, Mermista and Perfuma put a stop to their intentions of singing shanties.

Then Scorpia found the Star Sisters, and her mothers paid special attention. The Princess doesn't know their names, they don't recall exactly what they three are called… And yet, it seemed like she managed to hide as much. Lydia was especially surprised, even more so when she noticed Perfuma stop in her tracks with a shocked expression. She surely told her she didn't know their names…

But they didn't dwell on it.

Moving on, they approached the table where the council of Mystacor had been accommodated and, as they were close enough, the Queens could hear Scorpia awkwardly welcome them and ask about the Head Sorcerer. Once again, she didn't know anyone by name, but with some help, she could completely hide it. After being reminded that the Head Sorcerer hadn't been placed with them, Scorpia nervously tried to pretend she knew, and wasn't actually expecting to find him at that table.

Fortunately for their daughter, the man soon walked past the table, and so she could excuse herself and go greet him. However, he seemed to be… in a rush. Scorpia couldn't do much more than welcome him personally and wish him a good party before he walked away.

Now that worried the Queens. They knew how sensitive she could be to such things…

Could Scorpia ignore that strange attitude of his and dismiss it as him being in a bad mood?

Dahlia placed a pincer on top of Lydia's and gave her a nod.

They had to trust their girl.

Fortunately, and probably thanks to Perfuma, she didn't seem affected.

As the Princesses moved on, they came across the infamous banished sorceress, who happened to be with King Micah's sister, no surprise, and another magician. It wasn't difficult for Dahlia to figure out who that was… But that made them realize Scorpia surely didn't know about them.

It didn't matter.

Scorpia called for Entrapta, probably to tell them where to sit, and then looked awkward and apologetic after whatever Entrapta said… Well, now she knows who that is, for sure…

Lydia let out a fond chuckle noticing how Perfuma guided Scorpia away, gently calming her down, and straight to greet Spinnerella and Netossa.

That was far better.

Their daughter immediately forgot all awkwardness and her expression brightened. She was always so happy to see the couple… The Queens had no idea what made them so "cool" as Scorpia always called them, but it didn't matter. They were good people, they made the Princess laugh, they were trustworthy…

Finally, they reluctantly left the couple and moved on to greet Sweet Bee, who happened to be chatting with Peekablue. Scorpia seemed awkward again, but handled it flawlessly, even if she couldn't notice it, and the Princesses eventually left them to enjoy the party.

The Queens exchanged proud looks, nodded in agreement, and gave the order for the main meal to be served.

—Please tell me that's everyone— Scorpia begged, once she found herself safely out of earshot from anyone other than Perfuma.

—Yes, that's all— the Princess chuckled. —And you did wonderful. So, if you're tired, we can just take a seat already.

—Please…— she whined, making her laugh again.

—Come on, let's go.

The pair didn't wait anymore and made their way to the royal table, where the other princesses had been accommodated along with the Queens.

The seat next to them was for Scorpia, which Perfuma didn't hesitate to open for her, making them both share a chuckle.

—Thank you…— the scorpioni princess giggled.

However, they couldn't exchange another word before the Queens' muttering reached their ears.

More gossiping.

Perfuma's expression darkened and she looked away immediately.

Well, it was probably time for Scorpia to interrupt.

—It's what I'm telling you… Simply fake. It must be.

—Mother! Mom!

—Oh, you finally join us, Dear— Dahlia let out, pretending she wasn't interrupted.

—So, uh, yeah…— the Princess hesitated. She couldn't do this… Or could she? Of course, she could. She could. Taking a deep breath, she gave them a determined look and began —Alright. I don't want to sound rude, Moms, you know I love you. But can you please stop gossiping about the guests?

—Oh…— Dahlia uttered, taken aback. —Sorry, Dear, I was just commenting something with your mom…

—No, you were- I'm not deaf, nor are my friends right here at this table— Scorpia insisted. —Please, Mother. Glimmer is right there. Even if you don't use her name, she will realize you're talking about her aunt…

The Queens had the decency to look ashamed.

—You're right, Scorpia. I apologize— Dahlia nodded. —We should instead discuss how well you did today!— she smirked.

—Congratulations, Dear— Lydia smiled. —You handled the speech and the personal greetings wonderfully.

—So, we were thinking…— her mother began. —If you, for instance, wanted to invite your friends to stay for the night…

—That'd be great!— Scorpia beamed.

—Just the princesses this time, though.

—She's right— Dahlia nodded. —The boys can stay another day.

—Oh, Bow and Sea Hawk will be so bummed…

—They will sure be— Perfuma agreed, stifling a giggle. —But you heard them. Another day.

After a few hours, the party eventually came to an end.

And with no incidents!

Almost no incidents.

Scorpia felt like she celebrated a bit too early when Adora returned to the table to tell her how she and Catra had found a magician walking out of the marked path…

—Wait, what!? Why would anyone wander around here!? It-it's dangerous!— Scorpia exclaimed, starting to panic.

—Yes, and everyone knows, alright? This person was just… I don't know, they don't look fine— Adora admitted, concerned. —And I mean besides the wound.

—Wo-wound!?

—They are fine. Catra is tending to them, Scorp. Don't panic.

—Too late! I-I need to go apologize.

—Wait, wait…— Adora tried to stop her, to no avail.

—Hey, Scorp! Where are you going?— Catra's voice suddenly interrupted as she arrived right in time to intercept the Princess.

—I'm going to check on the magician! Adora just told me…

—They are fine. Their friend- Well, you could- Let's just say they are in good company and being taken care of, alright?

—Bu-but what happened!?

—They didn't want to speak much. Must have… gone for some fresh air, and then a creature jumped up from the sand— Catra briefly explained. —Adora and I happened to be nearby, so we stopped it before it could do more than scratch them.

—They are alright and insisted they didn't want to bother you or your mothers— Adora remarked.

—I should still… check on them. I-I mean, you've heard Frosta talking about the duty of a host and all. I should…

—Ah… Alright, Scorpia. You're right— Catra sighed. —But why don't you wait until they come to say farewell?

—Fine— the Princess agreed, groaning a bit.

She anxiously waited until the time came, dutifully bid farewell to all the guests, and profusely apologized for the incident when the magician went to say their goodbyes.

When she finally joined her friends after everyone was gone, Frosta made sure to let Scorpia know how well she had handled, not only hosting the party, but also having an incident with a guest, no less.

—…I mean it. You provided a welcoming atmosphere, you were attentive, and showed all due concern for your guests.

—Oh, thank you so much, Frosta!— Scorpia happily replied, wanting to hug her. —Can I, uh…

—Sure, come here, Scorp— the Princess smiled, welcoming the hug. As the scorpioni embraced her for a moment, Perfuma felt on the verge of tears and had to keep herself from making any comments, well aware of how Frosta would take it. And just as expected, as soon as she realized how everyone was looking at them, the young Princess stepped back, cleared her throat, and said —Well, I suppose it's time to get started on that sleepover, right!?

—Of course! You get going and I'll get us some snacks from the kitchen— Scorpia ushered them.

She was gone before they could ask which way her room was, so Perfuma took them there instead.

—Oh, it's quite spacious! And there are a lot of pillows here! This will be optimal for us all to sleep tonight— Entrapta noticed.

—If we sleep— Adora laughed.

—We should. Perfuma's party isn't as late as the others…— Catra reminded her.

—Oh, Bow would totally agree— Glimmer commented, already missing him.

—Come on, your boyfriend will be fine on his own this once.

—You didn't see the look in his eyes…

—Right!? Sea Hawk too. They looked so betrayed— Mermista agreed.

—I have the snacks!— Scorpia interrupted, as she arrived balancing a lot of bowls with her pincers.

—Woo-hoo!

Her friends helped her put everything down without dropping anything, then gathered some pillows in a circle and sat around the bowls, wasting no time before digging in.

—So, what were you talking about?

—Just that Sea Hawk and Bow were a bit upset about not being invited…— Mermista lazily answered, before throwing a snack on her mouth.

—Oh, yeah, I saw. I'm sorry… My moms said next time they can.

—It's alright, Scorp. Don't worry. I-I'm sure they understand!— Glimmer nervously laughed. —Right?

—Of course, you'll see they are all fine tomorrow— Adora dismissively assured her.

—And before that, we were just discussing that we probably should sleep at least a bit since my party tomorrow starts earlier than the other parties— Perfuma went on.

—Oh, right! Well, don't worry. This place is dead silent all night. I'm sure you all will sleep soundly— Scorpia assured them, completely oblivious to how ominous that sounded.

—Re-really?— Glimmer stammered. —Why's that?

—Who knows! It's just how Horror Hall is… I used to get scared when I was little. Can you imagine!? Being scared of your own home!?— the Princess laughed, unaware of the concerned looks of her friends. —But not anymore. Even less tonight with you all here too…

And so concern was replaced by emotion.

—Aww, that's so sweet!— Adora let out, voicing what they all were thinking, and making Scorpia blush.

Seemingly apologetic all of a sudden, she nervously suggested —Let's change subjects before I get all sappy and emotional… Perfuma! Why don't you tell us about your party tomorrow?

—Sure— she giggled. —Well, I actually have a bit of a surprise for everyone tomorrow… I don't know if I can tell you, though— she commented, looking at Adora at the end as if asking for permission.

—Yeah, why not… I think people are already speculating, so it may not be that much of a surprise, after all— she replied, resigned.

—Alright then: tomorrow I'll briefly welcome everyone and then lend Adora the spotlight so she can make an announcement!— she excitedly said.

—Wait, you… told Perfuma!?— Catra reacted, failing to hide her indignation.

—Oh, no, no… She didn't! I just guessed it and offered her to announce it at my party— the Princess rushed to clarify.

—Yeah, I just- I didn't have time to tell you. I was about to do it when the incident with the creature happened— Adora explained. —That's why I wanted to talk with you in private…

—Oh… I see— Catra huffed. —Can't believe we can't even keep a secret without rumours rising.

—So, it's true?— Glimmer finally dared ask.

—Yeah, Sparkles.

—Oh, I hoped so!— she exclaimed. —I heard Auntie mention the rumours, and she's so excited!— she revealed. —Although… The, uh, rumour thing also applies to the announcement happening tomorrow…

—Wait, what?— Perfuma let out, with a sad tone.

—Yeah, someone must have heard you offering Adora to speak at your party and all…

—Ah…— the plumerian sighed. —Sorry, guys. I guess I really ruined the surprise.

—Never mind, Princess— Catra dismissively replied, clicking her tongue. —It's not a big deal…

—I, um… What did I miss?— Scorpia finally decided to ask, awkward. —I don't think I've heard of… whatever you're talking about and my mothers have been too focused on that drama since Bright Moon's party, you know?

—I'm almost tempted to leave you in the dark now— Catra smirked.

—No!— she whined. —I want to know! Please, please!

—In fact, I don't know either and would like to know too— Frosta admitted.

—I have recorded all rumours heard in our social gatherings until today, and I am sure it's…

—I'll stop you right there— Catra interrupted Entrapta, placing a hand on her shoulder. —I rather tell them myself.

—Oh, sure!— she smiled.

—Well, you know Adora and I have been engaged for a while…

—You're marrying!?

—Damn, Scorp, let me finish— Catra chuckled. —We are, yes. Specifically, at the end of the week.

—No way!— Glimmer yelled, squealing.

—We asked the Head Sorcerer of Mystacor for permission to hold the ceremony at the beginning of their party, and he accepted, so…

—Girls, that's awesome!— Mermista interrupted, unusually excited. —Why didn't you tell us before!?

—Congratulations are in order, but I wonder the same. We now have little time to prepare our speeches for the ceremony— Frosta pointed out.

—You don't have to give any speeches if you don't want to…— Adora assured her.

—Well, while it's proper protocol, I suppose I can always express my well-wishes to you now, more privately instead of in front of an audience— she nodded, serious. Her expression then softened, she let out a smile and made sure to remain formal as she expressed —I'm very happy for you both and I wish you a prosperous marriage.

—Thank you, Princess— Catra first said. Then a smirk appeared on her lips and she added —But you can loosen up a bit, you know? It's just us.

The other princesses gave Frosta an encouraging look, and Scorpia even dared say —Come on, Little one. Don't be shy.

That seemed to finally get through her façade and the Princess of Snows rushed to hug them both, chuckling and crying tears of joy.

—That's better— Catra let out, patting her back fondly.

—I'm really happy…— she sniffed.

—Thank you— Adora smiled, hugging her back.

Perfuma rested against Scorpia, a warm feeling in her chest seeing Frosta open up and relax the mature demeanor she always forces herself to keep.

Glimmer and Mermista shared a look of agreement, holding back from making any comments so the Princess wouldn't feel ashamed of her behaviour. After all, it was so unusual that even Entrapta found it surprising and happily cheered.

When Frosta finally let go, sighing in relief, and returned to her spot next to Glimmer, she brushed away her tears and chuckled.

—Don't look so surprised, I'm still a young teen, you know?— she complained, light-heartedly.

—We know. But we're glad to see you behave like it— Perfuma admitted.

—Oh, you want to see me behave like a teen? Then take that!— she exclaimed, suddenly throwing her pillow at her.

—Hey!

—Pillow fight!— Glimmer yelled, immediately smashing hers against Mermista.

—You're on!— the Princess scoffed, retaliating.

In a second, more pillows flew left and right, laughter filled the room, and the fun began.

Glimmer, Mermista, and Catra got competitive, dodging pillows and trying to hit as many of the other Princesses as they could. Scorpia, on the other hand, tried to hold back, afraid of hurting someone despite it being just pillows, and eventually got knocked back.

Right after, Perfuma fell next to her, still laughing, and turned to look at the scorpioni princess.

Reaching for her pincer, she smiled softly and muttered —Today was great, Love.

—I-I…— Scorpia stuttered, blushing. —I'm glad…— she finally sighed, smiling back. —…my Love.

End Notes

Once more, I hope you liked and enjoyed it, Rose (^_^)

I also pray I did justice to the princesses and managed their speech and personality correctly.

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!
