Once Upon a Spell of Obtainment (a Path 1 spin-off)

by Xenakis (IceRosesCrown)

Summary

Everyone knows the story of She-Ra, the legendary warrior of old times who returned… as a former Horde soldier. Everyone knows of her adventures, her deeds… Some know of her past, her childhood, and the dark sorceress who raised her. Few know the story of that sorceress, or how she became the corrupted nightmare she was after casting a certain… spell.

And almost no one knows the story of how that spell came to be.

Notes

Hello hello there
Today I bring you: A spin-off of this series (which u needn't have read to understand this, I guess) that kinda summarizes my headcanons about: The Spell of Obtainment, its creation, SW's master(s) before she became a tutor in Mystacor, and some headcanons about Norwyn too…
The events of this fic are mostly references to stuff I've mentioned in the series (Path 1), and then other stuff I hadn't explained/mentioned before, that build the whole picture of what I propose as origin of the Spell of Obtainment…

I'm getting a bit repetitive (/^\) But, still I'll say it again, u don't need to have read Path 1 to understand this fic, you'll only miss a few references and characters like Zosia, Anil Ju, or Nolrem will be new to you, but then again, it doesn't/shouldn't affect the experience

Anyways, I hope u enjoy! :D
~~This shouldn't have taken me so long to write, oops, but at least it's finally here~~

The kingdom of Mystacor was never a place of tragedies.

However, there were some times when calamities would strike, and some… unlucky bastard would lose everything.

Such was the case of a prominent old tutor that the young Light Spinner, back then only Beatrix, greatly admired. She called them “Master Ju”, and wanted nothing more than to make them proud.

And yet, not even their own son could manage as much.

They weren’t always like that, of course. Yet, being one of the first unlucky bastards in, perhaps, two decades, what else could be spected?

They had lost their wife about a week or so after their son was born, because of a strange seismic event that hit Mystacor.

It was the beginning of the end for them.

As Master Ju was unable to get over the loss of their wife, they became obsessed with bringing her back.

Their colleagues all tried to warn them it’d be impossible… yet they only cut relationship with everyone who “dared discourage them”.

After a few years, only their closest friends remained: a young anthropomorphic ram called Norwyn, and an even younger human woman called Zosia.

For some reason, despite both being just as vocal as everyone else about the matter, they still allowed those two to be around them and their son…

—I’m back! How did little Anil behave?

—Like a little beast, as usual— Zosia replied, reproachingly. —He misses his father. You know it.

—Well, I’m quite busy— they reminded her.

—Khaast…

—Don’t start with that tone, woman.

—I didn’t even say anything!

—I know what you will say. It’s always the same. And like I told Norwyn, I’m not stopping.

—At least have the decency to spare some time for your child. He needs you!

—Zosia.

—Khaast.

—He needs a mother. Not me— they insisted.

—How old does he have to be for you to realize that won't happen!?— Zosia scoffed. —Five years!

—But I'm closer than ever!

The woman let out a deep sigh and spared a glance at Anil, who had fallen asleep on the couch.

—He didn't want to eat lunch. As always. But I left some stew on your kitchen, so please feed him— Zosia told him, aiming for the door. —And maybe choose one day of the week to spend with him, will you?

—Maybe…

—Good night, Khaast— the woman farewelled, expression somber as she left.

Later that same week, Norwyn and Zosia were discussing what little they knew about Khaast Ju's project.

—I can't even imagine…— the anthropomorphic ram let out, shaking his head.

—Me neither. I just know they've been observing those murals almost every day now. Why do underground murals…

—You and I both know those murals only speak about a great evil. They are a warning!

—Yet they look at them as if they were a solution… I don't know why— Zosia pointed out. —Some of their pupils are of their same opinion too.

—Don't even talk about their students. It seems like all the most belligerent ones like them the most.

—Or you're just jealous that the young prodigy prefers Khaast over you— Zosia laughed. —But seriously, Norwyn. What are we supposed to do about this!?

—How would I know!?

—Well, you are part of the council. I am not. If any of us can do something, that's you.

—Khaast was also part of the council…

—They left it long ago enough for them to be out of protection by now.

—Listen: We may know the murals spell nothing good, but without actually knowing what their project entails, how can I convince the council that it's dangerous?

—Just looking at those murals is enough!

—Zosia. I know. I know. They don't.

—Then we can only try to talk Khaast out of it…

—For now, yes.

—How?

—Maybe- No, well, we've tried that— he considered.

—No, using Anil to shift their attention is useless.

—That poor child…

—I know— Zosia sighed, hugging herself. —I'll see what I can do. And you try to get the council to stop them too.

—I'll try— Norwyn nodded.

Like that, another year passed, and no one could convince Khaast Ju of how perilous their project was.

Zosia had recently graduated, at long last, and was on her way to see Norwyn for a totally-not-secret party he was organizing for her.

However, on the way there, she came across Khaast, alone in their classroom.

—Hey! Afternoon!

—Oh, hey, Zosia.

—What are you doing here?

—It's my classroom.

—Why are you still here and alone? Class ended about half an hour ago.

—I know. And, uh, congrats on your graduation.

—Thank you. But I would rather you just… went to the party I absolutely don't know about — she told them, nudging them with a chuckle.

—I'm busy. I can't now.

—Khaast…

—I mean it. I'm-I'm so close to making a breakthrough here!

—But…

—Listen: I know I can finally try this soon— they insisted shaking a scroll between their hands. —I need to do this. You know that.

—What I know is that you need rest. And your son needs time with you! You haven't seen him in almost a year since his uncle took him away from Mystacor! Why don't you take the day, at least today? Go to the party, take Anil too…

—No. End of the matter.

—But- You can't seriously mean it. You aren't trying that strange spell, are you?

—I am.

—It is too dangerous, you shouldn't risk yourself like that— she insisted.

—Drop it, Zosia. I know what I'm doing— they replied, mildly annoyed.

—How can you be such a hardhead? Don't you understand it could kill you!?— she insisted, almost yelling.

—Why is it so difficult for you to understand it is not up for discussion!?

—But…

—I do not care.

Zosia's eyes suddenly stung terribly.

She wanted to cry.

They were… beyond salvation, weren't they?

Resigned, the woman turned around to leave and pretended not to notice one of Khaast Ju's pupils spying on them.

That girl- Beatrix.

She worried both Norwyn and her, much like Khaast themselves.

Time kept flying by.

Norwyn and Zosia tried and failed to convince the stubborn tutor to abandon the spell and return with their son. They failed to make Khaast see what they were doing to their life, their reputation, and Anil's childhood.

Since the kid had been taken by his uncle, away from Mystacor, Khaast, far from fighting to keep his soon by their side, instead considered it a sign they had to work harder and finally test their newly-crafted spell.

It was finished at last.

But… they knew they couldn't ask for permission to test it. After all, Norwyn had been… poisoning the council against them. They felt betrayed.

Yet it didn't matter.

They were close to obtaining the power to recover the only person that mattered to them.

Khaast Ju would bring their wife back.

Only then would Anil have a happy life.

They were sure.

That way, the next moon alignment, the tutor known as Master Ju secretly made their way to the Lunarium.

Unbeknownst to them, someone followed.

They were close.

They would… finally do it.

No one could stop them now.

Not in time, at least.

So they began frantically drawing the summoning spell.

The obtainment spell.

The scroll was tossed aside as soon as the last sigil was drawn, and then… they cast it.

Soon, a black amorphous mass appeared above them.

The little spy at the entrance of the Lunarium gasped, and Khaast knew someone was behind them.

But what did it matter now?

The parasite they had summoned fell over them before Master Ju could so much as realize they were doomed…

The young girl spying took a step back, then heard someone else coming and looked away just for a moment before returning her sight to the basin in the middle of the lunarium, where the parasite had already consumed her Master and left without a trace.

She could recognize the Head Master followed by Norwyn and some other tutors as they arrived…

They picked up the scroll and immediately ordered it to be sealed, and Khaast to be found.

But that young girl knew… they wouldn't ever be found.

About seven years passed since the incident and disappearence of Khaast Ju.

Perhaps a bit more.

Beatrix, now known as Light Spinner, had turned nineteen recently, and graduated about a week before, so she now had permission to work in whatever project she wished. Hence, it was no surprise for her friend, who had yet to graduate, to find her fumbling with lots of scrolls he couldn't recognize.

After hesitating at the door for a good while he decided to step inside and finally congratulate her for her graduation.

—Knock, knock!— he jokingly began, calling her attention. —How's the newly graduated tutor doing?

—Busy— she briskly replied.

—A huge project, I see…— he nodded, trying not to take that tone to heart. —Is this why you've been dissapeared the past week?

—Indeed. And I'm far from done.

—You didn't even celebrate your birthday.

—It's irrelevant— she replied, not even sparing him a look.

—I know you're… quite dedicated and perfectionist, Light Spinner, so I understand why you've been locked up with this.

—But?

—But… this is consuming you! Yo-you just graduated, you have new pupils…— he began enumerating, brow furrowed in concern.

—That's enough. Retire. I am busy— she immediately ordered, finally turning around to face him.

—I'm just worried.

—Don’t be, Nolrem.

Her angry, almost disgusted expression was something he couldn’t ignore.

It hurt him.

He was worried, but he knew better than to argue with her right now, so he complied and walked out of the room.

Now free to return to her work, Light Spinner solely focused on organizing the scrolls all around her on a large table in the middle of the room.

She then took the one in the center, raised it for a moment, and put it back. Right after, checking the rest of the scrolls, she moved them around, discarded some, leaving only the most relevant to her intentions: fixing that scroll in the middle, the Spell of Obtainment.

Light Spinner was a very stubborn young woman, but knew when to accept defeat.

For now, at least.

After several days and sleepless nights, she finally came to terms with the idea that it was completely usless, and the project was archived.

She would have had to test it, yet… she wouldn’t dare.

But then again, it still remained present in the back of her mind.

She greatly admired Master Ju, the one tutor who always told her they saw great promise in her, and it enraged her to hear all the nasty rumours about them.

Light Spinner knew they had a sound plan. She was so sure it could work. They had only good intentions, so why did no one help them!?

But she’d do it. She knew, one day, she’d manage to fix that spell, and she’d prove everyone how right her Master was.

A few years later, a teenager was slowly moving closer to his graduation in Mystacor.

Anil Ju.

Light Spinner knew him, and had exchanged a few words with him, so there was no mistaking it: he was just like his father. She even suspected he would possibly graduate a bit earlier than the average, maybe with twenty-one or twenty-two in just a few years.

The problem was that everyone knew who his father was.

And Light Spinner calling him “Kid Ju” didn’t exactly help.

She could have been his one ally, yet he never recognized her as such…

He didn't know Light Spinner was trying to clear his father's reputation. Because she never told him.

Since Anil couldn't remember his father, said he never "met them", which she didn't know wasn't true, and just mentioned that he knew they were always working on a certain project, and seemed… disgusted about it, Light Spinner thought he'd be another enemy…

Perhaps, it was a question of fate trying to keep Mystacor safe just a bit longer…

But fate also dictated the day still had to come, because only four years after Light Spinner archived her Master's project, she decided to dust it once more.

The Horde's sudden advance in such a short time while, simultaneously, the Princess Alliance failed to protect Etheria, gave her the perfect reason to work on it again…

And then… a young prodigy gave her hope.

Micah walked into the picture as the last piece of the puzzle.

The final component of what would be the worst catastrophe to strike Mystacor since Khaast Ju's tragedy.

The only thing she needed to actually try the spell at last.

The rest of the story is widely known in Mystacor, albeit in different, maybe more exaggerated versions of what truly happened.

Perhaps only Micah knows what really went down that fateful day, and it may not be important whether everyone else learns the truth or not.

After all, nothing can change the past; Light Spinner's death, Shadow Weaver's rise, and everything that came after that…

Beatrix realized too late that Master Ju had, in fact, always been wrong.

End Notes

Alright! That was it for this!
I know it's not that long, and I kinda glossed over some stuff, but I think it's enough to show and explain what I like to think could have been the origin of that fateful spell…

Anyways
I think I don't have anything else to say, so I hope u enjoyed, thank you for reading, and see you in another fic :D
