The Hospital

by Xenakis (IceRosesCrown)

Summary

Shadow Weaver is running out of time…

Part 1

There was no time.

She had to do this now.

If not, when?

Running down the streets, Shadow Weaver rushed to the hospital.

She'd regret it if she arrived late.

She couldn't arrive late.

Please let her get there in time.

She was sweating, yet felt so cold.

Her heart beating fast, blood pounding in her ears.

She was so desperate, however, that she didn't pay any attention, only kept pushing forward, running across streets in the middle of the transit.

She had to get there.

She had to…

…before she died.

Breathing heavily, she finally stopped at the door of the hospital. Or rather, was stopped by an officer.

—Please slow down— they said. —Are you here to see someone?

—Yes! Now! Let me through!

—Ma'am, you need to get registered first.

—There's no time. I have to…

—It's the protocol. Go to the reception and get registered— they insisted.

Ugh, how infuriating.

—Alright, I'll do so— she hissed.

As they finally moved from the door, she pretended to go for the reception desk, walking slowly and calmly, until she saw him turn around and sprinted down a corridor to her left, ignoring everyone around her.

She was close.

Part 2

No one dared stop her, even when she barged into a lift about to close.

Once again, she was breathing heavily, gasping for air while waiting for the doors to open at the right floor.

She looked so feral, so mad, that the people inside with her wouldn't dare say a word either.

She gave one a nasty look as she felt observed, but didn't have the air to bark at them for it.

And it didn't matter anyways.

She's almost there.

She'd arrive at last.

Perhaps she was still in time?

The doors finally opened on the third floor, where all critical patients' rooms were located, and she rushed out.

The number, what's the number?

Four, three, six? Or was it…

She took out her phone with shaky hands, quickly searched her messages until she found it.

Micah told him four, six, three.

Alright.

Now she could finally find it.

She turned on the corner, looked around frantically, and finally, there was the door.

She didn't knock.

She wouldn't wait to be allowed inside.

Shadow Weaver opened the door to a white room and her eyes immediately settled on the bed.

—Casta will be fine— Micah said, smiling sadly.
