Always an Angel (Never a God)

by unicorn_sparkles2006

Summary

Adora would never tell Catra, or honestly anyone, how she felt. She could never tell the stories of what happened all those years ago in the dark corners of the fright zone, and she definitely can't show the way it effected her.
First she was a Shadow Weaver's, child soldier, then a weapon, and now she's just Adora.
Or, 5 times Adora hid what shadow weaver did to her, and the 1 time she didn't.

Catra

Adora felt wrong. She watched her feet take each step, feeling disconnected from her body.

It's better than what she does to Catra, Adora though to herself. The thought of Catra's small body encased in red lightning burned in her mind.

She got to the barracks faster than she realized, surprised to see Catra waiting for her on her bunk.

"Where were you, Adora?" Catra's face was pinched up in concern, a rare expression for the 7 year old feline, "You meeting with Shadow Weaver should've been over forever ago."

"She wanted me to train," The lie rolled easily off of Adora'a tongue dispite the way her brain felt foggy. "She said that my scores weren't the best today- that I needed to do better." She wished that was the truth- wished she still didn't feel Shadow Waver's hands touching her.

"You've been training with her a lot," Catra seemed suspicious, Adora worried that she knew the secret she had kept so hard for the last few years.

"My scores have been off a lot," Adora scoffed in response.

"You would tell me if something was wrong, right, 'Dora?" Adora hadn't realized Catra stand up next to her, let alone put her hand on her shoulder. "Nothing bad can happen as long as we have each other, remember."

Adora wanted to pull her hand away, it was just Catra, what was wrong with her. Catra would never try to hurt her. "I know," Adora knew that Catra could read her fake smile, but she really hoped she wouldn't ask.

Thankfully, she dropped the conversation and grabbed Adora's hand, "Come on, dummy- I got your ration bars for you. It was the grey ones tonight."

Adora was thankful for Catra, and the way she made the sinking feeling in her stomach disappear. But, she didn't know what she would do if Catra ever found out- what Catra would think. But, Catra was right, nothing bad could ever happen with the two of them together.

The Squad

It was 30 minutes till dinner time and Adora wasn't there. Catra was worried. No one had seen her since earlier that morning- right before one of their squad training exercises.

"I can't believe she got out of training today," Lonnie scoffed, pulling Catra out of her thoughts.

The 14 year old felt Lonnie's annoyance, "Maybe one of us will finally have our shot at being force captain."

Lonnie scoffed louder at Catra, "Yeah right, like force captain would be anyone other than Shadow Weaver's golden child."

An odd sensation rolled down Catra's back, almost like a mix of worry and jealousy, "I bet she's doing her own private training because she's better than us."

Kyle, who sat there the whole time, finally spoke, "It isn't right for us to talk about her like that. Adora always looks out for us."

"Adora only looks out for us because she has all sorts of special treatment," Lonnie was almost shouting, making Kyle shudder.

"I don't even want to think of the punishment I would get for missing dinner," Catra chuckled, dry and cold as she pushed down a lump in her throat.

It was almost on cue that the doors the the barracks opened, revealing Adora. Shadow Weaver stood behind her, both hands on her shoulders. Adora's eyes were unfocused and looked past Catra and the others, it seemed like she wasn't really there in the room with them.

"Impressive scores today," Shadow Weaver's voice was cold and make the room feel thick. "I didn't think that the four of you had it in you." She left as quickly as she came, the door only giving a soft click as she left.

“How was your picnic?” Lonnie asked, her eyebrow raised as she teased Adora.

Adora didn’t answer. Her unfocused eyes moved in Lonnie’s direction, but she remained quiet.

“Where were you, Adora,” Catra was close to Adora now, her voice came out barely above a whisper.

“Training,” Adora’s voice was scratchy and came out sudden, almost making the others in the room jump.

“You were training? All day? And with Shadow Weaver?” Kyle was the only one who really seemed scared, or like he cared at all.

Adora looked like she was ready to respond, but was cut off by a clanging noise from the dining hall.

Adora looked dazed and as if she would just fall at any moment. Catra reached for her hand, but she quickly pulled it away to her chest.

“Adora?” Catra whispered, her fear almost showing in her voice.

Adora didn’t want to talk about what happened. She didn’t want to tell Catra how Shadow Weaver had pulled her away while she was getting ready early that morning. She didn’t want to remember the feeling of Shadow Weaver’s hands, or the dark shadows encasing her every time she tried to fight.

“I was training,” She said again, desperation in her voice. It wasn’t a lie. After Shadow Weaver was done with her the two trained. She had spend several hours of the day dodging red lighting and shadow tendrils.

It was obvious that Catra didn’t believe her, but she knew that she wasn’t going to push it. Adora knew that Catra had a narrative in her head of Adora being the golden child and of Catra being hated, and she wouldn’t try that hard to change it.

So, Adora took Catra’s hand, ignoring the way it made her skin creep, and walked to the dining hall. She forced the gray ration bar down her throat and ignored the stares from her squad. And she really hoped that no one could see the bruises peeking up from her collarbone.

Glimmer and Bow

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Adora had only been in Brightmoon for a few weeks but it seemed like forever. She felt like a stranger, well she was a stranger, and an imposter. She hated the way that the princesses treated her, like she was one of them. Really, it was She'ra who was one of them, and she was pretty sure everyone knew that.

She'ra didn't feel like Adora, it was like they were two different beings, different people. The feeling after she converted back to her normal self reminded her of the walks to the barracks after her meetings with Shadow Weaver. Her mind always felt hazy and her brain felt disconnected from her limbs. But, she had to pretend that nothing was wrong, besides, the princesses wouldn't want her there if she wasn't She'ra.

Her, Bow, and Glimmer were walking back to the castle after a lost battle. A battle Adora had insisted they were ready for (ok, it was really Glimmer who insisted, but Adora strongly backed her up.) She could feel the dread rolling down her spine. How many times would Angella let her fail? How many more times could she lead the rebellion to failure before they kicked her out? Angella never punished her, or anyone is seemed like. It was odd to get used to a lack of punishment, and she felt like a strike could come at any minute.

"Adora," Bow and Glimmer were looking at her strangely, they did that a lot. They realized from her blank stare that she didn't hear them. "Are you ok, you kinda seem out of it?"

"And you did take a lot of hits," Glimmer added.

"I'm fine," The lie rolled so easily off of her tongue. "She'ra heals me, remember." She'ra did not heal her, that was another thing she could not figure out. Why was she such a failure that She'ra wouldn't give her all her powers?

"If you say so," Bow commented, obviously not convinced.

"Now we gotta figure out what to tell my mom." Something cold went through Adora's body- she was waiting for that.

"We actually did really good this mission," Bow was somehow smiling. "No one got hurt, and we were only like 50 hord soldiers away from winning."

"I'll explain everything to the queen, as She'ra I should've been fighting harder."

Both Glimmer and Bow gaped at me until Bow broke the silence, "Adora, even as She'ra you can only do so much. You did the best you can."

Her stomach dropped at his words. They would never get it, the times Shadow Weaver made her train for hours, "You must do better than your best, Adora!" "Is that really all you've got? How weak." They would never understand all the nights she spend with her, taking the punishment for her crimes and everyone in her squadron. "Things were different in the horde," She said slowly. "We had to do better than our bests, and we were punished if we didn't."

"That's horrible," Bow's eyes were filled with tears. He would never make it a day in the horde. "They really hurt you, didn't they?"

She hurt me, she wanted to say. Everything was at the top of her tongue. Everything Shadow Weaver said to her, every threat, every punishment, and every touch she wish that she could wash away. "It was how it was," Adora chose to say instead. "I had it lucky, some others had it was worse than me." A part deep inside her doubted that it was true.

Shadow Weaver was here in Brightmoon

Shadow Weaver

Was here

In Brightmoon

Adora felt like she couldn't breath. From the moment that Shadow Weaver appeared in her room she felt like she was suffocating. The air was thick, and her throat wasn't big enough to swallow it.

Her skin crawled with the knowing that Shadow Weaver was only a few rooms away, that she was just out of the woman's reach. Maybe if Shadow Weaver reached out she could touch her. Adora didn't want to think in the though, she didn't want to breathe in the same air as her. But, at the same time she did, she wanted to look her straight in the eye. Would she still feel the same way that she did when she was just a child?

"You can't go in there, Adora," It was like Bow could read her mind. Maybe he could, or maybe she had said her thought's out loud. She really didn't know or care.

"I'm not going to," She huffed, she most definitely was, but he didn't need to know that.

"We know she hurt you," She had almost forgotten Glimmer was in the room too.

“She didn’t hurt me, and even if she did- she can’t hurt me anymore.”

Bow and Glimmer didn’t seem convinced. Maybe they heard her screaming at night from nightmares, maybe they saw her self-inflicted scars hiding underneath her shorts, or maybe she was just that easy to read.

“My mom doesn’t want you do be in the same room as her,” Glimmer said ‘her’ bitterly, as if she knew half the things Shadow Weaver had done. “And you can’t disobey orders from the queen.” Like hell she couldn’t, Angella proved a long time ago she wouldn’t lay a hand on Adora, proved the most punishment she gave was a hard glare.

So, when Glimmer and Bow finally fell asleep she snuck out of the room and through the hall. She stopped at the door where Shadow Weaver was being held. Did she really want to see her? Was she really as strong as she believed herself to be?

The door opened with a load creak and Shadow Weaver stared at her. She smirked as if she knew she was coming. She did know Adora well, maybe Bow and Glimmer were right.

“Adora,” Shadow Weaver’s voice sent chills down her spine. She couldn’t breathe. It was like the air was sucked out of her lungs.

“Shadow Weaver,” She forced out. She wouldn’t show her weakness, she couldn’t give her that. She’ra flowed through her in an odd way that made her fingertips tingle. She could heal her. Did she want to? Would it make her any bigger than her if she sat and watched her die.

“I know you can heal me, Adora” So she still could read Adora well. “You owe me, after everything thing i’ve done for you.”

Adora wanted to take a step back, but her feet stayed planted to the ground. Her lungs ached as breathing got harder, man she should’ve listened to Bow and Glimmer.

She took a step towards Shadow Weavee, transforming into She'ra and breaking the barrier. She laid her hands on her abuser's shoulders, not fully believing what she was doing. The magic flowed through her and into Shadow Weaver. She felt pain crumble into her stomach as she healed her. She would never tell anyone how healing someone hurt her, how she felt their pain just as raw. It also exhausted her, she detransformed with a groan, falling into Shadow Weaver's greedy arms.

Every part of her was screaming. She wanted go pull away but her limbs ached and Shadow Weaver was too strong.

"I missed you my child," Shadow Weaver whispered into Adora's ear, brushing her hair back with her rotten fingertips.

Now Adora really couldn't breathe, and nausea filled her stomach, threatening to spill into her throat. Where were Bow and Glimmer? Angella? Someone in this castle had to know she would sneak in her.

But shame filled her bones, she didn't want anyone to break into the room and save her. What would they thing? She was supposed to be She'ra, and she couldn't even protect herself.

"Stop," She pushed herself away with shaking arms, attempting to shake Shadow Weaver's hands off hers. She managed to get away and stand at the same time the door slammed open.

Glimmer, Bow, and Angella stood in the room. Glimmer rushed towards her, grabbing her and pulling her away from Shadow Weaver. At the same time, Angella cast another spell, trapping Shadow Weaver in the force field that she belonged in.

Adora's knees went like jelly and she collapsed into Glimmers arms, not being able to feel anything around her. She let out a sob as her lungs stopped contracting, her vision blurry.

She felt someone else's touch and heard a voice lost somewhere in the oblivion. She shuddered away from their touch, her breath still logged in her swollen throat.

“Breathe,” She somehow heard but didn’t at the same time. “You are safe now, it’s only me. There is no one else around.”

The touches still felt like fire on her skin. Why wouldn’t this person leave her alone? She didn’t want to be held or touched. She tried to follow the voice’s instructions, but it was to much and her limbs felt heavy, and her vision finally went black.

When Adora awoke, her head felt groggy and every inch of her ached.

“You’re awake,” The familiar voice said. Angella.

Adora felt ashamed as she realized it was the queen who was comforting her, trying to calm her down.

“What happened?” Maybe it was all her imagination. Maybe Shadow Weaver wasn’t there, maybe no one saw her like that.

“I was hoping to ask you that, Adora.” Angella’s tone was patient, something that somehow mad Adora feel worse.

“I snuck to see Shadow Weaver,” She admitted. “And I healed her.”

“I figured that,” Angella hummed. “But, what else happened? You seemed hurt, and eventually had a panic attack when we saw you.”

Adora let out a huff, not sure what to say. Not sure which witness to confess. “I didn’t have a panic attack- I just healed her, that takes a lot out of me.”

“I know what a panic attack looks like, Adora,” Bow Adora was really caught.”My husband suffered from them, he was also mentored by Shadow Weaver.”

Dread rolled down Adora’s spine. Did she know? Did Shadow Weaver hurt someone else the same way? She wanted to ask, “I don’t know what you’re talking about.” She said instead.

“I’m here when you want to talk, Adora,” Like that would ever happen. “But, if healing really hurts you like that, you should make sure not to use it so frequently.”

Micah

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Adora hated it. She hated a lot of things recently.

She hated how Shadow Weaver was everywhere. She hated how Glimmer was gone. She hated that she broke the sword and lost She'ra. And she really hated the way Micah looked at her every time Shadow Weaver left a lingering touch on her shoulder

Adora honestly wasn't quite sure what to do anymore. Bots and clones kept finding them, she felt like she was failing everyone. Maybe she already had.

She threw herself into battle, almost admiring the way her muscles tore and ached at the absence of She'ra. She also isolated herself from everyone around her, and hurt herself in more ways than one.

She could tell Bow was worried, everyone was really. But Bow's worried glances affected her the most.

Adora was in her tent alone, sweat and nausea rolling off her body like waves. They had a tough battle, she knew that they almost didn't make it out. She was pretty sure she broke a rib, or maybe two, but everyone else had bigger priorities- there were people hurt worse.

It wasn't the first time she had broken a rib, that was when she was just a child. She had been seven years old and had gotten on Shadow Weaver's bad side one night. She remembered the sickening crack and the way she hopled back to her bunk, not able to tell anyone what happened.

She was almost surprised that Shadow Weaver hadn't hurt her all this time in Brightmoon. She was still her creepy normal self, but her actions never went beyond whispering threats and passing touches. Maybe she didn't want a grown Adora, maybe she had lost her charm now. But it didn't mean that Adora wasn't always waiting, always waiting for a strike or a touch gone to far.

Her thoughts were interrupted by a soft knocking on her tent, if it could even be considered knocking.

"Go away Bow, I need some time alone."

"I am unfortunately not Bow," Micah stood at the entrance of her tent, causing Adora to stand, making her collapse with a gasp of pain.

"Adora!" He rushed towards her, catching her before she hit the ground. "I figured you were hurt, but I didn't think it was this bad. Why didn't you say anything?"

"I'm fine," She answered through gritted teeth. "It's really nothing to worry about."

"I'm worried if you're hurt," His eyes were filled with concern that reminded Adora so much of Glimmer that it almost made her cry.

"My ribs," She finally choked out, forcing herself to not look away from the man.

"Adora," Micah's voice was soft, something Adora was not used to. "I need to go get some supplies and I'll be right back."

Adora just sat there on the bed silently, not responding when Micah came back and tended to her wounds. She flinched every few touches, but her eyes remained unfocused on the wall of her tent.

"I'm worried, Adora," Micah said as he was finally finished. "All of us are worried."

"Why?" Adora was confused. Why was anyone worried? It was her fault they were where they are, so they should want her to suffer.

“You’re pushing yourself,” Micah sucked his teeth like he was debating what to say. “You aren’t She’ra anymore.”

“I know I’m not,” She wasn’t sure why that hurt more than it should. “I broke the sword- I failed.”

Micah shook his head, “You haven’t failed. The horde hasn’t won yet.”

“It’s inevitable,” Her voice was raising. “If I didn’t mess everything up we might have won the war by now.”

“You did your best.”

”And my best isn’t good enough!” It came out as a yell, surprising both her and Micah. Adora stared at him with wide eyes, embarrassed she had let out her anxieties.

“Why do you think that?” He sat down next to her, putting his hand on her shoulder.

Adora just shrugged, willing herself to not push him away. She debated telling him the the words that circled around her head at night, the voices begging her to break. “It’s just true. If I was better the war wouldn’t be so bad, if i was better Angella would still be here, if I was better Horde Prime wouldn’t be haunting us.”

“That’s not true, Adora,” Adora looked in Micah’s eyes as he spoke. “One person can only do so much.”

“But I’m She’ra,” Her voice came out as nothing more than a whisper.

“But you’re still Adora.”

She stared at him for a few minutes in silence, feeling a strange sense of comfort wash over her.

“Was it Shadow Weaver?” His voice suddenly had desperation, “Is she the one who told you these things?”

Adora only stared at him confused, his tone reminding her of the days Catra would come limping away from her sessions with Shadow Weaver. “Why?”

“You can say something if Shadow Weaver ever hurt you, Adora, verbally or physically.”

Adora finally pushed the man away, anxiety taking away the comforting feeling, “Shadow Weaver never hurt me.” She shook her head almost wildly. Was he crazy? Shadow Weaver was at the camp- she could be listening in on the two right now.

“Adora,” He paused. “When I was a kid, Shadow Weaver taught me, and I know she has a tendency of hurting the children that she is around.”

Alarm bells sounded in her head, threatening to take away the air from her lungs. “I told you that she never hurt me.” She stood up, trying to get as far away from Micah as possible, “I don’t know what she did to you, or anyone else- but she never did anything to me.”

Adora could tell by the look in his eyes that Micah didn’t believe her. She didn’t know how he knew. Maybe Bow slipped the few things she had told him. Maybe it was the way she flinched when Shadow Weaver got close. Whatever it was, she had to make sure no one else found out anything else.

Micah left the room, realizing that Adora was long done with this conversation, leaving Adora with her own crippling thoughts. A few moments after he left, she exited the tent herself, discovering that her fears were very real. Shadow Weaver stood there, obviously listening in on their conversation.

She grabbed Adora’s arm, pulling her close enough to whisper into her ear, “Good girl, Adora, I knew you would never tell.”

Catra (again)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Things weren't easy after the war. Adora figured it wouldn't be, but she didn't think it would be so hard either. Horde Prime was gone, along with the rest of the horde, but there were lingering wounds left on Etheria- lingering wounds left on Adora.

The Rebellion, thought there was not much more to rebel against, save for a few rebel groups, were about five months into restoration. Adora was learning that healing takes time, apparently, especially for buildings and lands destroyed.

Even though the war had been over for quite a few months, and she lived in Brightmoon with all of her friends- and even shared a room with Catra, Adora was still struggling. She didn't want anyone to see how restless she had become, despite how obvious it was. She didn't want anyone to see any weakness, really.

Adora could tell that everyone could see right through her, especially Catra. Apparently the girl you've known your whole life can read you like a book, who would've guessed?

Adora sat out on their balcony on a late night. Her and Catra had went to bed hours before, but of course Adora couldn't stay asleep. She had been awoken with a nightmare that made her stomach crawl and her knees weak. Though it wasn't really a nightmare, she had lived through it once. Her thoughts, and the drumming of her fingers on the railing, were silenced by the door opening behind her.

"Adora?" Catra approached the woman slowly, smart enough to know not to touch her shoulder unexpectedly.

"I couldn't sleep."

“Nightmares again?”

Adora didn’t answer Catra, she just continued to stare at the stars.

“You know you can talk to me, Adora,” Catra sighed. “We’re here for each other.” To say that Catra was worried would be an understatement. She had noticed something odd in Adora’s behavior ever since the moment they defeated Horde Prime, maybe even the moment they were together on Darla in space. She pretended not to notice, knowing that Adora would only push her away, but the worry had began to eat at her. She hated seeing Adora upset, not eating dinner and spending late nights training.

“It’s hard,” Adora whispered, to the surprise of Catra. She knew it was hard for her partner to speak about her feelings.

“Talking about it.”

Catra frowned, not quite sure what to say. She had started talking to someone in Plumaria about meditation and healing, but she still wasn’t really sure how to comfort someone. “Do you want to talk about what the nightmare was about?”

“I never said I had a nightmare,” Adora grumbled, only loud enough for Catra to hear.

“I know you well, dork. You don’t have to be ashamed.”

“It was a memory,” Adora paused, swallowing the nervous feeling down her throat. Shadow Weaver was dead, and could never hurt her or Catra again. “When we were kids, Shadow Weaver hurt me- she hurt me more than I let anyone know.”

Catra felt sick, she couldn’t remember many times she saw Shadow Weaver hurt Adora, but she knew how well Adora was a hiding things. “Hurt you how?”

Adora sighed, obviously not wanting to say anymore. Catra squeezed her shoulder in encouragement. “The memory from the nightmare was when we were about seven. Shadow Weaver and I had a deal,” Adora looked away from Catra, not wanting to see her face. “If I was behaved and quiet when she hurt me, she wouldn’t hurt you,” Adora hadn’t noticed the tears beginning to fall from her eyes, or that Catra had grabbed her hand. “She never kept her word, but I always believed her. But one day, she hurt you- really bad, right after she promised she would leave you alone.” Adora sobbed, Catra could only guess what occasion she was talking about as she rubbed soothing circles on Adora’s knuckles.

Adora continued with a shudder, “After you came back into the barracks after your meeting, I stormed into the Red Garnet Chamber and I screamed at her. I screamed at her for how she hurt me, and how she still hurt you.”

Catra now knew the exact moment Adora was talking about. Catra had skipped their training that day and Shadow Weaver was furious, she had taken her anger out, as usual. But she remembered Adora being upset that night, and she remembered how Adora did not return to the barracks that night.

“I remember that,” Catra whispered. “You didn’t come back that night, or for training the next morning- and when I finally had asked where you were, I was told that you were in the infirmary.”

“She didn’t want to take me there,” Adora voice was bitter. “She said that we deserved the way we were treated, she said I deserved for her to rape me.”

The air left Catra’s lungs as her stomach twisted and her skin crawled. It made sense, all the extra lessons with Shadow Weaver, the meetings that went late, the unexplained bruises, and the way she flinched at touches. Catra hated how obvious it was, it felt like it was all crashing back at her, how many warning signs did she ignore?

“Shadow Weaver-“ The words couldn’t even leave Catra’s mouth, and her eyes watered as Adora gave a subtle nod. “For how long?”

Adora sucked in a breath, “It started when we were around six.”

“Started?” Catra felt like she could vomit, but she swallowed her spit to feel strong for Adora.

“It stopped as soon as I left the Frightzone. She never tried anything in Brightmoon, though i’m sure she thought about it.”

It was quiet for a moment as Catra gained her thoughts, “I’m glad you told me, Adora. I hope you know that you can always talk to me.”

Adora showed the most she could of a smile, “I love you, Catra.”

“I love you too, Adora. Nothing could ever change that.”

Adora continued to get better with the support of Catra and her friends. She eventually opened about everything, all of her memories and twisted thoughts- and she was always met with support.
