Breaking Point

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/65806822.

Rating:
Explicit

Archive Warning:
Creator Chose Not To Use Archive Warnings

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Catra (She-Ra)

Characters:
Adora (She-Ra), Catra (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Alternate Universe - Canon Divergence, 5 Times, Established Relationship, Adora and Catra got together in the horde, Adora is in Love with Catra (She-Ra)

Language:
English

Series:
Part 1 of The Strongest Will Survive

Stats:
Published: 2025-05-23 Words: 5,064 Chapters: 1/1

Breaking Point

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/65806822.

Rating:
Explicit

Archive Warning:
Creator Chose Not To Use Archive Warnings

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Catra (She-Ra)

Characters:
Adora (She-Ra), Catra (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Alternate Universe - Canon Divergence, 5 Times, Established Relationship, Adora and Catra got together in the horde, Adora is in Love with Catra (She-Ra)

Language:
English

Series:
Part 1 of The Strongest Will Survive

Stats:
Published: 2025-05-23 Words: 5,064 Chapters: 1/1

Breaking Point

by Anonymously_speaking

Summary

5 times Adora snuck into the Fright Zone to see Catra.

And 1 time Catra snuck into Bright Moon to see Adora.

Notes

This may seem familiar to some of yall. I took down Boot That Crushed Her Throat because it wasn't working, so I scrapped the first chapter and changed the approach to the story I wanted to tell.

See the end of the work for more notes

I

In war, one year is a long damn time. It's a lifetime, an eternity. But it flew by, that first year.

The war was a generations-long atrocity, don't get it twisted. To Catra though, the war really started one year ago. She thought she knew war, thought she was meant for it. She thought that as long as Adora looked at her like that then war was her purpose.

The anniversary of that day in the springtime that changed the trajectory of her life came and passed. It was an average day, in a way, but part of Catra felt that it shouldn't have been. A momentous anniversary, and yet it was still paperwork and minor decisions and staring at maps that she doubted Hordak had ever laid eyes on.

Somehow even Scorpia knew not to bother Catra that day. She wrangled Entrapta away without asking, and it was Catra's suspicion that perhaps Lonnie had let slip what really happened one year ago.

A week came and passed. Entrapta made her bots, Scorpia drew her stick figure pictures, and Catra waged war. That's what she knew to do and what she knew she was good at.

"So, why exactly are we attacking the woods?" Scorpia asked carefully as she followed Catra to her captain's quarters. She carried a large bin of paperwork that Catra didn't care to carry herself. But Scorpia volunteered with gusto and who was Catra to deny her such simple joys?

"The princesses rely on it to keep us away from Bright Moon." Catra glanced to the ceiling. This was not the first time she'd explained her plan. "Keep them busy trying to protect and repair this border, and they're not paying attention to other important parts of the world. While our bots keep them busy, our troops are installing supply routes and seizing production sites."

They rounded the corner to Catra's quarters, and a soldier straightened her back at their approach. Scorpia didn't seem to notice her, she wore full armor, including a helmet, and this was nothing particularly unusual. The Fright Zone knew Catra and her moods by now, a nervous guard meant nothing.

But it set Catra on edge anyway. She glared at the soldier, lip curling as they passed. Catra caught a whiff of a familiar scent, and Scorpia slammed the crate of paperwork into the door. She nearly knocked herself completely to the ground, and so began the endless apologies and embarrassed rambling.

Catra grumbled to herself, taking a second to steady Scorpia on her feet and collect a few escaped reports. When she turned, the soldier was gone.

"Come on, I have a long night."

"You sure you don't want help, Wildcat?"

Catra frowned down the corridor after the shadows before she finally followed Scorpia into her room. "Yes. Get out."

Scorpia chattered cheerily for a few more minutes before Catra finally shoved her through the door and slammed it behind her. She whirled on her heel to glare at the wreckage Scorpia wrought every time she passed through.

Sure, the idea that Scorpia could so casually invade Catra's space with minimal retaliation and not a single permanent scar should be concerning. But Catra didn't have the energy to think too hard about it. As prickly as Catra pretended to be, having one person she could count on to be a consistent presence in her life, even as a nuisance, was a relief.

She started with the reports scattered across her bed, shuffling them to the desk, and then moving to the reports on the floor.

The ones on the floor at least were contained to folders, but she still muttered darkly to herself as she stooped to grab them too.

A knock at the door served solely to further irritate her. She marched to the door and swung it open with a snarl. "Back off!"

The soldier on the other side only tilted her head. Her face shield obscured her face, so Catra couldn't place exactly which of her subordinates bothered her this time. Catra glared as hard as she could possibly muster.

"What?"

The soldier moved quickly, placing one hand on Catra's chest and shoving her hard back into her quarters. Before Catra could react, she'd stumbled into the room and the soldier had slammed the door behind her.

Catra hissed, preparing her claws to aim for the soft parts in the armor between the helmet and the chest plate. The soldier removed her helmet, and painfully familiar blonde hair, tangled and messy, spilled out.

Catra froze, as if the icy blue eyes staring at her had magically rooted her feet to the floor. This was bold, even for Adora.

"What are you doing here?" Catra snapped, readying to pounce.

Adora rolled her eyes. "Stop that. I'm not here to fight."

"Then why are you here?"

Adora's shoulders slumped, and it looked a little too much like relief. Catra tried not to think about the strange alternate universe they had entered. A universe where Adora's shoulders relaxed when her eyes landed on Catra after coming home from a dangerous mission away. A universe where she had never found the sword, and instead Adora fought alongside Catra in the war. A universe where Adora loved her more than she hated the Horde and couldn't stand to be away for too long.

"I missed you."

The cruel laughter that erupted from Catra's chest couldn't quite be controlled, and Adora watched her as if she'd been struck across the face. "What?" Catra wheezed. "You missed me? This is war, Adora! I'm not stupid. I bet your little princess girlfriend is right behind you, sabotaging whatever she can get her sparkly hands on."

Adora rolled her eyes, and when her gaze settled back on Catra, instead of ice, she felt heat. "You hear alarms?" Adora asked, gesturing around her with her hands. "If you thought you were under attack you would have called for backup by now."

"Like I'd need it."

Adora scoffed, a small smirk growing across her face despite the intensity of the situation. "You would."

Catra stalked forward. "Convince me then, why should I believe you?"

Adora didn't back away, and she bowed her head as Catra came closer. A strand of her hair fell from her ponytail to frame her face and it swayed as their breath mixed in the space between them. They were nose to nose, and Catra could hear the hitch of her breath. It rocked her to her core.

"Do you see a sword?"

Catra's gaze wandered from Adora's eyes down to her lips, finally to the space between their chests. "You can transform it." She tried weakly.

Adora let out a bitter laugh, a quiet huff that fizzled into the electricity between them. "Not very well," She whispered. She whispered, but it may as well have been a scream.

Catra held her breath. "Why?"

She leaned even further in, their noses brushed. She could practically feel Adora's lips on hers already. "I missed you."

The way Adora's voice husked out, the intensity of her gaze, it melted Catra as easily as if she'd never left the year before. "I don't understand-"

"Catra," Adora said, voice growing stern. "Yes you do."

"Why now?"

Adora moved back, shrugging and turning to stare helplessly at the plain walls of Catra's captain's quarters. "I couldn't tell you. I don't know."

"Bad breakup?" Catra sneered, moving to sit primly on the edge of her bed and watching Adora begin to pace. She unclipped her chest plate and bracers, tossing them to the ground as the tension in her shoulders only grew. "Here for a rebound?"

Adora glared over her shoulder. "It's not like that with Glimmer."

"Right," Catra scoffed. "Here to make a plea for mercy or something? What are you doing here?"

"I don't know!" Adora snapped, whirling around, a little wild in the eyes and clearly completely thrown off by her own actions. "I just- I'm She-ra and this legendary warrior, you know? And I don't know how to be She-ra and I'm trying to train but nothing seems to work and no one seems to understand!"

Catra blinked, her eyebrows slowly creeping up her forehead as Adora ranted. "So you came to your enemy's bedroom to yell about this?"

"You're not my enemy." Adora said a little too quickly.

"Just the one leading an army against you."

Adora kicked one of her discarded bracers across the room. "You're still Catra."

"And you're still Adora."

"What?"

Catra shook her head ruefully. "You can't stand not being a prodigy."

Adora placed her hands on her hips, scowling at the floor. She had stripped fully down to just her undershirt and pants, even her boots had come off. It seemed Adora had made herself at home. "What are you talking about?"

Catra shrugged. "I'm just saying. You hate it when you can't get something perfect immediately." She tilted her head, and one ear flicked as she watched Adora squirm. "You don't know what it's like to fail."

"I fail all the time!"

"Since when?" Catra barked a laugh. "You're seriously frustrated because you can't transform your sword right?"

"No!" Adora seemed to rethink herself. "Yes, well- it's not just about the sword. It's about everything! I have nothing to go off of, I'm just winging it!"

"Isn't that what you princesses do?"

"No!"

"Oh," Catra winced. "Your plans suck then."

Adora's glare lightened. There was something casual and familiar about teasing Adora, and Catra desperately missed simpler times. "I just- I don't know what I'm doing."

Adora took two long strides to collapse onto the bed dramatically beside Catra. She pouted at the floor. Catra couldn't stop the fond way she watched Adora work her way through her frustrations.

It didn't take long for Adora to notice Catra staring at her. Adora's smile started off small, and eventually it grew into a dopey, infectious grin that Catra couldn't help but return.

Catra blinked and Adora's hand had come up to stroke her cheek with her knuckles. "I wish you had come with me."

Catra shook her head, but leaned into Adora's touch anyway. "You know I couldn't."

"I don't, actually," Adora whispered. "You could still come with me. Just leave it all behind. We'd be together and-"

"I can't." Catra's voice caught in her throat. "I can't."

Adora's shoulders slumped and her smile turned sad. "Do we have to be soldiers right now?"

On the surface, the question didn't make sense. But Catra knew what Adora was asking. "We're still us."

"I'll never stop, you know." A stray tear fell down Adora's cheek. "Loving you, I mean."

"You have to."

"I won't."

"Adora," It was Catra's turn to grow stern. "You have to let go."

Adora blanched, and Catra had the distinct feeling that perhaps she'd said the wrong thing. "No." Adora was never harsh with Catra, but this time, maybe this time Catra had fucked something up.

"You-"

"No."

"Adora-"

"I mean it." Catra would be damned if the stubborn set of Adora's jaw did anything but push her further towards a mistake she couldn't undo. Adora tilted her head, and that loose strand of hair fell across her cheek. If she didn't move away right now, she wouldn't be able to stop herself.

She didn't even hesitate.

Catra's fingers brushed her stray hair behind her ear, and Adora surged forward into a kiss that set Catra on fire. There was no surprise, no hesitation, no pause to think of the consequences. Catra couldn't be sure who started it all, but they pulled apart for just a second to breathe, and Adora's shirt was gone.

"I missed this." Adora whispered, pulling Catra fully into her lap and running her hands down her back. Catra's clothes loosened, and she realized a little late that Adora had already unzipped her body suit.

"Stop saying that." Catra grumbled, taking a second to run a claw across her hair tie and smirking as it snapped across the room. Adora clicked her tongue, smiling up at Catra.

"But I did- I do." She amended.

"I was ready to tear your throat out not too long ago." Catra said, taking a second to nip at Adora's pulse point.

"I'd have let you."

"No you wouldn't have."

"No, but it's romantic to say that." Adora gasped as Catra's tongue ran along her jaw.

"Is it?" Catra husked, nipping at the shell of Adora's ear.

"What are we talking about?" Adora mumbled both hands coming down to cup Catra's ass.

Catra whined, letting her hips roll. Adora watched her, so clearly infatuated, and Catra couldn't, for the life of her, conjure a thought. "I don't remember."

Adora twisted, tossing Catra onto her back on the bed. She climbed up to pin her to the sheets. "You're compliant today."

"I make a thousand decisions a day, Adora, give me a break."

"I'm sorry, did that sound like a complaint?"

If Catra giggled, she wouldn't admit to it. "I don't know, it sounded put out."

"Let me rephrase then." Adora kissed her, though her smirk got in the way. "I love you."

"You have to stop." Catra grumbled and Adora pulled away to prop her cheek against her palm.

She smiled down at Catra lazily. "You want me to stop?"

"Stop saying shit like that." Catra rolled her eyes. "Don't you dare stop anything else."

Adora hummed, far too confident in herself. Catra needed to find a way to knock her down a notch, and quickly. "Is that what you want?"

"Don't get cocky, Princess."

"Too late, Kitten."

Catra rolled her eyes. "You're ridiculous."

Adora leaned in for another kiss. "And I missed you."

"Stop saying that!"

"Why?" Adora asked, tilting her head and continuing her trail of kisses down Catra's throat. "It's true."

"I don't want to hear it, Adora."

"You know what I do want to hear?" She peeked at Catra from the kisses she placed across her chest. "Take a guess."

II

Her ear twitched as she approached her chambers. It'd been a long day and Scorpia's poison was still working its way through Catra's body enough to cause a sharp headache.

But she could hear pacing just beyond the door, in a room that should be thoroughly empty without Catra in it.

Her lip curled as she shoved her way through the door and slammed it behind her. She crossed her arms and leaned against the door as the soldier paced the tiny room beside Catra's bed.

"At least you kept the helmet on." Catra drawled. The soldier startled with a yelp, and lost her balance as she pivoted on one foot to face Catra. She hadn't been quiet, Catra wasn't sure how she could possibly have missed her entrance.

Adora removed her helmet and coughed awkwardly into her gloved fist. "I uh, was afraid someone else would enter first-"

"You shouldn't be here." Catra grumbled, but ultimately, her shoulders still relaxed at Adora's nervous twitching.

"I heard what happened today. I wanted to check on you."

"I'm surprised you're not begging at Entrapta's door."

Adora shook her head. "They're cut up about it. But I just- I wanted to see you."

"Why?"

"You were taken captive!"

"By your friends." Catra rolled her eyes. She stepped further into the room anyway, and loosened her uniform. She'd been soaked through for hours, she desperately needed warm, dry clothes.

Adora pouted, but stepped aside so Catra could reach her dresser of Horde-issued clothing. "Catra-"

"What?"

"Are you okay?"

Catra looked up at the ceiling, as if asking for guidance, before she glared over her shoulder at Adora. "What kind of question is that?"

After a childhood of changing in front of each other, and at least a year of more than that, Catra hardly paid any mind to Adora's presence as she stripped her clothes then and there. If Adora cared, which Catra knew she didn't, she could look away on her own.

"The kind that needs an answer."

"Adora, what do you want to hear?"

"The truth."

"The truth? Please, you couldn't handle that."

Adora shuffled, kicking off her own boots and removing her chest plate and gloves. She took a seat on Catra's bed to watch her finish changing. "I think you're more afraid of it than I am."

"Me? Afraid?"

"Yes, you, afraid. You're afraid. You were captured today."

"And was immediately released." Catra rolled her eyes, turning with her hands on her hips. "Your friends don't make good soldiers."

"They're not soldiers. None of them are." Adora tilted her head. "We're not leading an army. But that doesn't answer my question."

"Your question isn't worth answering."

Adora frowned at her and quickly hopped up to approach her. Catra hated the comfort she took when Adora's hands rested upon her shoulders and she leaned into her space. She only had to look up a little, but it was enough to break down the walls Catra had been working on since the last time Adora snuck into the Fright Zone.

"Will you tell me what happened?"

"You know what happened."

"I want to hear it from you."

Catra's lip curled into a snarl. "Your friends took me prisoner and tried to take me to Bright Moon."

Adora sighed and retreated back to the bed, this time she laid down and made herself comfortable the way they did when they were cadets. "We don't have to talk about it, if you don't want to."

"I don't."

"Fine."

"Fine."

Catra scowled, but approached anyway. She'd put on a Horde-issued shirt and neglected the pants, so she was ready for sleep. Though, Adora didn't seem interested in sleeping.

Catra gave Adora her back, and she wrapped Catra tight in her arms. She placed a soft kiss to her shoulder and heaved a sigh. "I had a shitty day."

Catra snorted. "Get in line."

It sounded callous, but she could feel Adora's lips turn up into a smile against her shoulder. "Ever heard a horse sing?"

Catra barked a laugh. "No, what?"

"It's awful. Truly bad." Adora giggled. "Now imagine that, all day long."

"So your flying horse sings too, huh?"

"Sings badly. You can't forget that detail."

"Scorpia sings too." Catra mumbled, stretching her limbs with a happy sigh. "She's got a nice voice though. It gets on my nerves most of the time. It's always when I need her to shut up."

Adora didn't say anything to that for a long moment. "I shouldn't be here… should I?"

Catra's tail thumped against the bed and her ears tilted backwards. "What do you mean?"

"I just- it's selfish, I guess." Adora whispered. "You have a life here and I just come in like you still want me."

Catra turned over to watch Adora. "You think I would be this angry if I didn’t wish you were here?"

Adora's eyebrows came together at the center of her forehead, and her bright blue eyes shined like tears were ready to fall. "I didn't leave the Horde because of you. You know that, right?"

Catra cleared her throat, struggling to maintain eye contact. "It doesn't matter why you left. You left."

"It does. It does matter. I never wanted to leave you behind." Adora blinked, and tears ran down her cheeks. "You know, that first day, I just, I didn't even think twice. I hadn't conceived of a world where you weren't with me."

"You need to go."

"No, Catra." Adora shook her head. "You need to know this. You need to know that I never wanted to fight you. I know I made an assumption, but I just couldn't imagine that you would rather be here without me."

Catra stared for a beat too long, and Adora let out a sob. Catra wiped away Adora's tears anyway. "Why didn’t you trust me to have your back that night?"

"What?"

"You left without me. And then you stayed away."

"I didn't know I would be defecting. I just knew that if you and I were both caught, they'd hurt you for it." Adora mumbled. "Why didn't you come with me?"

"Adora-"

"Why wasn't it enough to know the Horde was hurting people?" Adora asked. "Why did you stay? Why wasn't I enough to walk away? I love you, why wasn't that enough?"

It felt like a slap to the face, and Catra wasn't ready for such a fight. "Go home, Adora."

Catra didn't wait for Adora's response. She pulled away and gathered Adora's stolen armor and shoved each piece into her arms. She sat there, silently crying, while Catra paced her room.

"Well? Go!"

Adora didn't say another word. And finally, before she put her helmet back on, she sent one final pleading glance Catra's way.

Catra refused to meet her eyes.

III

Adora shuddered with her forehead resting against Catra's shoulder. Her breath hitched higher in pitch, and though nothing was ever silent in the Whispering Woods, all Catra cared about was the puffing of breath against her neck.

"Why," Adora struggled to whisper. "Why did you do it?"

Catra hushed her with a particularly well-timed twist of her wrist and a quiet shushing against the shell of her ear. "It doesn't matter right now."

Adora whimpered as Catra continued her pace between Adora's legs. She scrabbled for a grounding grip against the bark of the tree Catra had backed her up against. "Yes, it does."

Catra shushed her again. "Let me take care of you now."

Adora's knees buckled and unlike the last time they'd met in these woods, Catra caught her.

Adora bit her lip as she came, struggling to stay quiet, but ultimately succeeding. Catra could barely hear her over the blood rushing in her own ears. Her pulse thundered with every shiver and gasp Adora did let slip, and finally, she slumped against Catra's chest.

Catra wrapped her arms around Adora's waist, holding her up against the tree. Despite everything she wanted to do and say, a purr erupted from her chest when Adora's arms wrapped tightly around her as well.

Catra felt her face heat up when Adora huffed again, a quiet giggle that she tried to stifle in Catra's hair. "Shut up."

Adora pulled back then and cupped Catra's face in both palms for a long, slow kiss. Catra melted, a boneless puddle unable to push Adora away any longer.

"There was a moment," Adora began, whispering against Catra's lips. "Right when I woke up. I saw the shattered crystal and I thought I'd killed someone. You were the last person I saw before… I thought it was you."

Catra's chest ached. "Adora," she mumbled. "This is war."

"It doesn't have to be like this."

Catra rolled her eyes, trying to shove out of Adora's grip, but she held tight. "But it is. I'm not going to run away like I'm your sidekick."

Adora grew frustrated then, glaring to the side. "I don't think you're my sidekick. That's never how I've seen you." Adora turned those bright blue eyes on Catra, and she could see the tears welling up as her desperation grew. Her fingers shook against Catra's sides. "I love you, Catra. I don't want to hurt you one day."

Catra grabbed Adora's jaw and placed a heated, angry kiss on her lips. She was sure to bite down on her bottom lip just enough for Adora to taste blood, before she turned away. She brushed past a bush on her way towards the Fright Zone. "That's a choice you'll have to make." She called over her shoulder.

IV

For the first time since Adora had first begun sneaking into the Fright Zone, Catra was actually relieved to see her in her quarters.

Adora still nursed a bruised lip, Catra supposed she had bitten her pretty hard.

At Catra's relieved sigh, Adora tilted her head. Her brows furrowed in that way they did when she saw something she didn't like. She set her helmet to the side on Catra's dresser and opened her arms.

Catra took the invitation without hesitation.

"What happened?"

"Hordak wants to empty some of the prison cells. Send them to Beast Island."

"Taking up too much space?"

"Yes," Catra whispered. "And in Shadow Weaver's case in particular, she's a liability."

Adora stiffened and her arms tightened around Catra's shoulders instinctually. "He wants you to send her away."

"Sentence her to death. Nothing lives out there, you know that."

"She could."

"She could." Catra agreed.

"What are you going to do?" Adora asked, voice carefully neutral.

"I told him to give me time," Catra said. "If I can get her to help, I won't have to send her away."

"Why do you want her help?" Adora pulled away to watch Catra's face. "She hurt us. She hurt you."

"She can still be of use." Catra shook her head, moving away to pace the room. "We're not the Rebels, Adora. We can't afford to pick and choose perfect allies. We take and use what we can get."

"It may be a conflict of interest," Adora conceded. "But Shadow Weaver can't be trusted. By any of us. She only hurts people, she's content that way."

"So what? I'm supposed to send her to die?" Catra threw her hands up. "That's not-"

"Right? It's not." Adora sat back on the bed to watch Catra pace. "What would you rather do? Leave her to rot here?"

Catra stilled. "I don't know."

"Why are you so worried about her?" Adora asked quietly. "She isn't a good person. She hurt us."

"I hurt you." Catra shook her head. "Why sneak in to see me then? Maybe it's the same reason."

V

Catra ran.

Catra didn't scare easily, it wasn't in her nature. But she found a new reason to be afraid. Her heart pounded as she rounded a corner.

Mercifully, she never encountered Scorpia on her way to her quarters. She didn't expect Adora for at least a few weeks, but when she saw a mysteriously twitchy guard milling around the door, she struggled to pull herself together.

She imagined the frown behind the helmet mask, and instead, Catra pulled the soldier inside her quarters by the elbow.

Adora pulled her helmet off as she stumbled across the room. "Calm down!" She yelped. "I'm sorry! You were so freaked out last time-"

Catra hissed, but ultimately she knew better than to argue. Adora was right. She had been freaked out last time, and she was freaked out now.

"Catra?"

"What?"

"You're shaking." Adora whispered, approaching slowly. She looked so concerned, so earnest in her compassion, it made Catra sick to her stomach. Adora cared about her, and she'd stayed behind out of spite.

Catra's ears flattened against her head. "That night you left, you were going to come back. Weren't you?"

"Yes?"

Catra shivered. "You have to stop."

"What?" Adora shook her head, preemptively disagreeing.

"You can't come back here."

Adora shook her head again, quicker this time. "No, I left you behind last time-"

"Is that what this all is?" Catra erupted into a brief hysterical laugh. "Adora, you need to let go."

Adora groaned, running a hand through her hair, mussing it from her ponytail. "No! I'm not giving up on you!"

Catra turned her back then. She tugged at her mane, allowing her mask to fall from her face. She didn't bother to pick it up when it clammered across the floor. "It's not safe here."

"Catra, what happened?"

"It doesn't matter." Catra straightened, sniffling a little. "If Hordak finds you here, we're both dead. Not sent-to-Beast-Island dead, dead dead."

Adora placed a hand on Catra's shoulder, nudging her to turn around. Catra turned, but kept her eyes trained on the ground. "You don't have to stay here-"

"Because the noble Rebels are so much better." Catra hissed. "After everything I've done, they'll throw me in a prison the moment I step foot in Bright Moon."

"They'll listen to me."

"Adora, will they?" Catra rolled her eyes. "You've been sneaking into the Fright Zone in secret for months."

Adora worried at her lip with her teeth. "They'll understand."

"I don't think they will."

"They'll understand." Adora's lips twitched into a smile. "I think they'll just be surprised that people fall in love in the Horde."

Catra huffed, shutting her eyes to avoid looking at Adora. "Don't go?"

"Come with me?"

"Not yet."

I

Adora struggled to fall asleep in Bright Moon following Shadow Weaver's arrival. Even knowing she was behind a strong magic barrier couldn't quite abate the anxiety that seemed to vibrate in her very bones.

So she hadn't quite been asleep when there was a scrape at the balcony, and the softest patter of feet. She'd spent her childhood listening for footsteps like those, she'd developed a keen sense of hearing trying to compete with Catra.

She squinted into the dark. "Catra?"

"Hey Adora." She whispered, stepping into the moonlight that fell across the floor.

Catra was ragged, exhausted. Dark circles under her eyes and disheveled hair made her look older, somehow.

"What are you doing here?"

"Don't get excited." Catra muttered, pattering further into the room and crawling onto Adora's cot. She curled into Adora's lap, tucking her head just under her chin like she did whenever Shadow Weaver used her magic to punish them as cadets. "I'm not joining your stupid rebellion. I'm leaving. A new mission. I might not be back for a while. Don't look for me."

"Where are you going?"

"It doesn't matter. Just. Don't try and follow me, okay?"

"Are you being sent to Beast Island?"

"No," Catra snorted. "I wish. You have to take care of yourself, Adora. Yourself and no one else."

Catra pulled away, batting away Adora's hands trying to pull her back. She leaned in for a searing kiss.

When she pulled away, Adora could see the tears in her eyes even in the dark. "I love you, okay? Don't do anything stupid."

"Why does this feel like goodbye?" Adora asked desperately as Catra made her way back to the balcony.

"Goodbye, Adora."

Catra disappeared over the handrail. Adora fell back into her bed with a huff, losing all of the air in her lungs with each heaving sob.

She would wake up the next day and blame the tearstains on Shadow Weaver.

End Notes

This is the preamble to a longer fic upcoming! Keep an eye out for part 2, which will be a multi-chap fic. Let me know what yall think!

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!