"I'm telling you, Catra, Adora has some sort of innate magic aside from her celestial magic," Kesi said one day as she and C'yara were settling in for a Super Pal Trio movie night. Adora and C'yara had been having movie nights for some time and then Adora had invited Kesi to join them. Kesi hadn't wanted to intrude but Adora managed to talk her into and now it became a somewhat regular thing for them.

"And I'm saying you're crazy," C'yara returned. "Adora's not a Magicat; she doesn't have an innate magical trick."

"Then how else do you explain it?" Kesi asked.

"Explain what?" Adora asked as she got back from the snack run. She sat the tray of snacks down on the table in front of the couch where Kesi and C'yara were sitting.

"How you just seem to know a person's gender identity and pronouns! You even know them before the person in question does sometimes!" Kesi explained as she grabbed a pastry from the tray Adora had carried.

"Kesi here thinks that you have some innate magical trick like we Magicats do," C'yara continued.

"And what do you think, Catra?" Adora asked with a slight frown as she took a seat between the two.

"I don't know what to think," C'yara stated. "But I don't buy that you have some sort of weird superpower. Maybe you've just gotten lucky so far." She then grabbed a cookie from the tray before leaning into Adora's side.

Adora wrapped an arm around her khai'tel, pulling her that much closer. Not for the first time, Adora privately bemoaned the fact that C'yara didn't wear cave culture clothing meaning that she couldn't pet her side without pulling up her shirt first (something that Adora wouldn't do).

"Why don't we put my 'weird superpower,' to the test, then?" Adora proposed. "We can get a whole bunch of pictures of people that I don't know and I can guess their gender or pronouns."

C'yara leaned forward to share a look with Kesi before the two girls nodded. "Next time we have movie night, we're putting you to the test," C'yara declared as she cuddled back into Adora's side.

"Sounds good to me," Adora said as she grabbed the remote to the projector. "But enough about that. I've been looking forward to this movie all week."

"But the last one was so bad," Kesi pointed out. They were currently getting ready to watch A Dance with Destiny 3 after having watched the second one last time.

Adora just smiled as she said "I know" before hitting play.

The movie was terrible but a fun time was had regardless.

Nine Years After the Coup Attempt

The next movie night came around and Adora found herself sitting in one of Catra's armchairs while Kesi set up the projector. Catra herself was sprawled out on her loveseat, tablet in hand.

While she had agreed to it, Adora honestly thought that this whole thing was a tad absurd. So she could accurately guess a person's pronouns. So what? It wasn't something she had ever really thought about before and it wasn't something she cared to think too much about now. It was just a thing that she could do.

"Okay! Ready!" Kesi said as she stepped away from the projector and took a seat next to Catra, remote in hand. "Are you ready, Adora?"

"Sure," Adora replied with a shrug.

Kesi pressed a button on the remote and a picture of a female Magicat was projected onto the screen. "Female. She/her," Adora said idly. Catra and Kesi shared a look before Catra tapped something on her tablet while Kesi clicked over to the next image.

"Non-binary. They/them."

Another slide.

"Male. He/him."

And another.

"Non-binary. She/they."

And another still.

"Genderfluid. Any."

On and one this went for what felt like forever. Adora was about to insist that they do something else when, after the thirtieth slide (Adora had counted), Kesi said, "Well, that's all of them."

"I don't believe it," Catra said incredulously. Her eyes had steadily grown wider over the course of the test. "She got all but one right."

"Which one did I miss?" Adora asked, her curiosity piqued. She was certain that she had gotten them all correct.

"Uh… This one," Catra said as she held out the tablet. Adora took it and her brow scrunched up in confusion. It was clearly a picture of a female Magicat. Sure, she had broad shoulders and rather masculine features but that didn't change the fact that she was a woman.

"But she's a woman," Adora said plainly.

Catra and Kesi shared another look before Kesi said, "I'll make a note of it. See, Catra? I told you she has a gift."

"Okay, fine, I'll admit it. Adora has a weird superpower that lets her know a person's gender identity and pronouns," Catra grumbled as she threw her hands up in the air. "She still doesn't have an innate magical trick, though. I would have sensed it if she was using magic."

"How else do you explain it?" Kesi asked with an arched brow.

Catra shrugged. "Weird superpower. Can we get on with the movie now?"

"Finally!" a familiar and unexpected voice said, causing everyone to jump in surprise as Caspin crawled out from beneath Adora's seat. "I thought you were never going to be finished!"

"Caspin!" Catra called out as she clutched her heart over her shirt. "When did you get here?!"

Caspin gave Catra a smile that highlighted his cat features and said, “I’ve been here the whole time.”

“Caspin, did you do something to my seat?” Adora asked as she eyed the young kit suspiciously.

Caspin ignored her. “I’d also like to point out that Big Sis ‘Dora knew that I was aeonic before everyone else. That's why I went to her first.”

Adora went to get up only for her eyes to widen. She tried again, grunting with effort, but remained seated.

“Are you okay, Adora?” Catra asked as Caspin started snickering.

“I’m— I’m stuck. Girls, I’m stuck to my chair,” Adora said as she just stared off into the middle distance.

“And that’s my cue to leave!” Caspin said through their laughter as they rushed out the door. “It’ll wear off in about an hour! Bye!”

“CASPIN! CASPIN, GET BACK HERE!”

Catra and Kesi just laughed at Adora’s misery.

“Well, since you’re not going anywhere anytime soon…” Catra began as she got up before climbing into Adora’s lap and tucking her head beneath Adora’s chin. She purred softly as her tail curled happily.

“The worst part of this is that I can’t move my arms to pet or hold you,” Adora said sadly.

“Don’t worry. We’ll get them back for this later. So. Movie?” Catra asked, looking back over at Kesi who was watching them with a fond smile.

"Movie," Kesi nodded as she got up to switch out the data crystals.

Three weeks later, that one person who Adora had supposedly been wrong about came out as aeonic.

Five Months After Adora's Abduction

There were several things about Adora that confused Scorpia. There were the obvious ones like her nearly completely redacted medical records or her oddly clean service history and then there were the less obvious ones like the random headaches or her cat-like behavior. None of those were what was confusing Scorpia the most at the moment, however.

No, what was confusing Scorpia was Adora's bizarre ability to correctly identify the gender of everyone she met. She had even been able to tell when a person who wasn't passing was trans!

That had been a weird experience. They had been in the mess hall when Adora was bumped into by another champion-in-training. Adora had said "Sorry, ma'am" which had confused Scorpia because she had been positive that the person had been male.

The other champion-in-training had rounded on Adora, surprise in his (her?) eyes as he (she?) asked, "Who told you?"

Adora had just looked confused as she answered, "Told me what, ma'am?"

There had been a long and awkward pause before the other champion-in-training had said, "Never mind. Watch where you're going next time," before shuffling off.

That encounter had left a burning question in Scorpia's mind, one that she had waited until that night before asking.

"Hey, Adora?" Scorpia asked as they were getting ready to bunk down for the night.

"What's up, Scorpia?" Adora returned. Scorpia was glad that Adora had been willing to just call her by name so quickly. It kept things casual in a way that Scorpia really appreciated.

"Why did you call that one person 'ma'am'?" she asked.

Adora sent her a confused look. "Huh? Oh! You mean back in the mess hall? Because she's a woman, obviously."

Scorpia returned Adora's confused look with one of her own. "But… they're clearly a man?"

Adora somehow looked even more confused. "No she's not. Misgendering people is rude, Scorpia, you should know this."

And now Scorpia was thoroughly flummoxed. "But… she, I guess, looked like a man?"

Adora hummed in thought for a moment. "She looked rather masculine, I guess, but that doesn't change the fact that she was a woman."

"How'd you know that someone who passes as a man was actually a woman? Wait, are they a trans man or a trans woman?"

"Trans woman," Adora answered easily. "As for how I know," she shrugged, "weird superpower, I guess."

Scorpia would later find out that the other champion-in-training was, indeed, a trans woman.

Adora just kept getting weirder by the day.

End Notes

Zelenal: I had wanted this to all be contained in the Act 1 period so that way I could just slot it in there but then it would have been way too short. Besides, it helps to show that Adora's weird superpower still functions even without her memories. By the by, this superpower is Adora's; it has nothing to do with She-Ra.
