The Jacket

by AuthorWithoutaName

Summary

Sometime after Horde Prime, Adora puts away her old red jacket. Thinking nothing of abandoning the iconic piece of clothing (okay, maybe abandoned is too strong a word, she basically just put it in her closet and forgot about it), the jacket suddenly finds a new owner.

(Or a post-canon fic about how Catra eventually starts wearing Adora's iconic jacket)

Notes

Alright, got sidetracked from my other fics and wrote this! I'm doing this as two chapters because I have more I want to write on it and not enough time. This is the first part. I'm hoping that I'll have the second part up by the weekend or sometime during the weekend!

I did not have a beta-reader for this! I wrote this in like a couple of hours while also working on a She-Ra/Spider-Man AU (so if you're reading that, I have started writing CH3 and I hope to have it posted this weekend!).

See the end of the work for more notes

Chapter 1

Adora wasn't sure when it began. Sometime after the incident with Horde Prime, she had stopped wearing the old red jacket. She wasn't sure why. She wore it for years. It was a staple piece of clothing for her… But sometime after the celebration, sometime after the peace talks in Bright Moon began, sometime after she had time to heal both physically and mentally from that day, she put the old jacket away.

Her and Glimmer came back from a day trip to Plumeria. It was a diplomatic mission, or that's what they told everyone. Sure. Perfuma and them discussed the continued alliance between Bright Moon and Plumeria and they were also looking into outsourcing some of their farming needs to Plumeria now, the added resources would help Bright Moon and it would help to boost Plumeria's economy. Mostly though, the trip was just so the three of them could catch up and visit.

The weather that day was nice. It was mid spring. The early mornings were usually frigid, prompting many to bundle up, but by midday, it usually got warm enough to drop some layers.

When they returned to Bright Moon, it was the late afternoon and their schedules were cleared, leaving them both to do whatever, which for Adora meant it was the perfect time for a training session.

Horde Prime was gone. Hordak was no longer a threat, but Adora still couldn't just stop training. No matter how often Bow and Glimmer tried. Catra tried to talk to her once about her continued need to train, but just once. She understood why Adora still did it, even when there were no more threats. Nothing else to fight.

Adora returned to her room first when they got back. Glimmer teleported them both back in the hallway, so it was really a no-brainer to stop by her room first. She was going to walk by her door anyway on her way to the training grounds.

Catra was already in the room. She was lounging by the window seat, a book in her hands, Melog curled up and presumably asleep nearby. They shrunk so that they could fit comfortably by Catra's legs. Catra's ears twitched as Adora closed the door behind her. She didn't look up from her book though.

"Good trip with Sparkles?" she asked, still reading… The Ballad of Min... What was that book about?

Sometime after the war, and after everything in Etheria had settled down, Catra picked up reading. She was making her way through the collection in Bright Moon's library, still trying to figure out what exactly she liked. If Catra particularly liked a book, she would recommend it to Adora.

"Yeah," Adora answered as she made her way to the closet. She pulled out a hanger and began to slide her jacket off. It wasn't exactly sweltering outside but she knew from experience that spending hours outside swinging a sword around in this weather would work up a sweat, especially while wearing a jacket. She could go the rest of the day without it. If she did get cold and needed it again, she could always come back to her room to grab it. They also only went to Plumeria today and didn't really do any manual labor, so it's not like the jacket needed to be cleaned before putting it away.

"Training?" Catra asked, still not looking up from her book.

"Yup," Adora replied, as she hung the jacket up, removing the golden pin from it. A gift from Angella when she first joined the Rebellion. She put the jacket in the closet, closing the door after.

She then turned to Catra and asked, "Do you wanna join me?"

Catra finally glanced up from the book, giving her a look that said really?. It was late afternoon. The sun was finally in position to create the perfect sunbeam on that window seat. Neither Catra nor Melog would be getting up for a while.

“Yeah,” Adora said, giving her a sheepish smile, “never mind.” She then turned to leave. She walked over the dresser and placed the golden pin on it. said, “Alright then. see you in a bit.”

Catra gave a small chuckle as she watched her.

“See you in a bit,” she called back. As soon as Adora closed the door, she went back to her book. It was an interesting story, though the hero in it sometimes reminded her too much of Adora, but not in a great way. After all, when the hero in the story is constantly putting herself in danger, claiming that it’s for the good of the world… Well, Catra had almost screamed at the book more than once. The only reason she was continuing it was because Bow got excited when he saw her grab it from the library this morning. Apparently, it was one of his and Glimmer’s favorites as kids.

She shivered. Usually the afternoons were more toasty. Now though, for some reason, it felt like the temperature had suddenly dropped. The sunbeam gave her some warmth. Actually, it gave her plenty. Still though… An opportunity had arisen. She could just go over to the bed and take a blanket off it. Snuggled under it while she read the book but there was another opinion too… One that she may or may not have been waiting on forever, even if she hadn’t realized it.
She put the book down on the windowsill and got down from the seat. Melog sleepily raised their head, their gaze following her as she went to the closet. Their head cocked sideways, watching her curiously as she took the hanger out, the familiar red jacket still on it.

Adora didn’t need it for the rest of the day anyway. She put it up, so clearly she was done wearing it. Truthfully, the jacket should probably be retired now. It survived a whole war (mostly). Sure, it had a couple of places that had been stitched up (she tried to ignore the newest and largest spot that had been stitched back together, the side where that First Ones’ monster sliced her).

Catra slowly slid her arms through the sleeves. She pulled at the jacket to straighten it up. She glanced at the mirror on the dresser. The jacket was larger on her. It didn't swallow her up but it was clear that it was meant for someone with a more muscular frame. Still though… She kind of liked how it looked on her. She also felt better wearing it… She felt more at ease. She suddenly felt more relaxed.

She returned to the window seat, Melog immediately settling down again as she got back to her previous lounging position. She took the book off of the windowsill, electing to ignore how much more relaxed she felt wearing the old jacket. She really should get Glimmer or Bow to take Adora to get a new jacket. She could just keep this one. Maybe she should get Glimmer to take her shopping and then she could pick out a new jacket for Adora, lessening the blow for when she tells Adora that she basically stole her iconic and probably favorite piece of clothing…

"Alright!" Glimmer announced excitedly as she poofed into the room, Catra in tow.

Catra still looked sick whenever Glimmer teleported her but she at least wasn't collapsing to her knees or dry heaving. Maybe in a few more weeks, she won't even feel the teleportation sickness as Bow called it.

Adora sat up from her spot on the windowsill. Earlier that day, Bow gave her a book History of the First Ones. His dad had found it and immediately gave it to him to give to her. The writing was all in the First Ones' language and with the war over and them now having more free time, it just made more sense to let Adora read through it first.

She placed the book on the windowsill, staring curiously at the white box tucked under Glimmer's arm. She glanced at Catra… Who she guessed at some point had gotten a new jacket… Weird… It looked almost identical to her own red jacket. She hadn’t worn it lately… She wasn’t sure why. Maybe it was because the weather was nice, she always ran hot so she didn’t exactly need a jacket to keep warm.

Glimmer stepped up to the window seat, presenting the box with way too much fanfare. She knelt down like a knight, holding the box now in both in hands, like a knight presenting a sword.

“Ta-da!”

Catra watched her amused, tail flickering playfully. Adora glanced from Glimmer to Catra, the confusion clear on her face, and then back to Glimmer.

“Wh-what’s going on?” she asked.

“Open it!” Glimmer almost begged, eyes sparkling like they were actually stars.

Adora took the box from Glimmer’s outreached hands and placed it in her lap. Glimmer stood up straight and glanced at Catra, a huge grin now on her face.

“It was Catra’s idea!”

Adora looked at her. Catra’s face was now red, almost as red as the new jacket she was wearing… Seriously, when did she get that? Never mind. Adora gingerly pulled the lid off the box. There, wrapped carefully in tissue paper was a light blue jacket.

“It… um…” Catra began, rubbing the back of her head uncomfortably.

Adora glanced at Catra, who was now watching her with some apprehension. She wanted to put the box and hug her, ask her what was suddenly stressing her out so much but with Glimmer in the room, she figured she would wait.

Glimmer was staring at Catra now too, but unlike Adora, she didn’t seem to catch the faint signs of anxiety. The tail now twitched from side to side as if she needed some sense of movement to calm herself. Adora understood. It's why she often found herself pacing in her room whenever she needed to figure something out. Maybe Catra was worried that she would hate the gift? Adora knew that she wasn't actually known for change (switching sides in the middle of a war aside…). She wore the same clothes for years. She kept to the same routine. Maybe Catra was just worried that she wouldn't appreciate the gift.

"I love it!" Adora finally said and she could see Catra visibly relax.

She carefully took the tissue paper out, got to her feet and put the new jacket on. It wasn't actually cold enough to need it. Not right now anyway, but she did love it and wanted to show Catra that she did. She zipped the jacket up and walked over to the mirror. It fit perfect. Better than the red one somehow.

"The… uh… The blue…" Catra stammered, as if she was still unsure of herself.

"Doesn't it match your eyes perfect!" Glimmer finished for her excitedly.

It did. Catra must have done that on purpose. Adora turned to Catra and smiled.

"Thanks! I really love it!"

Catra gave a soft smile back.

"Yeah… Of course!" Quietly, she added, "Dummy…"

Seriously though… Where did Catra get that red jacket?

A few months went by. The temperature gradually grew colder, and the days shorter. It was overcast more often than not now and even on the rare sunny day, the weather was still quite chilly. This prompted most of the residents of Etheria, and those in Bright Moon especially it seemed, to bundle up some.

It was raining today. It started up sometime during the night, Adora wasn’t sure when. At first it was just a calm shower, the faintly pattering against the windows, barely audible. It was like that for most of last night and throughout the morning.

It lulled Adora back to sleep during the morning. Prompting her to forego her usual early workout. The curtains were shut. The grey, soon to be blackening sky, helped to provide more darkness to the room then. It was peaceful. The only sound other than the faint drum of rain against the windows was the low, dull rumble of purrs.

Now, in the afternoon, the once calm showers had grown into a fierce storm.

The curtains were drawn back, allowing them a full view of the storm as it raged on. The sky was black now. Fierce. Lightning flashed often. The constant thunder alternated between dull grumbles and almost ear-piercing roars. The wind was menacing. Below the castle, the outskirts of the Whispering Woods swayed and rocked with the blast. Rain pelted against the window.

Adora was resting on the window seat now. Despite the uneventful morning, years of training, years of fighting a war, seemed to have finally caught up with her. In the past, she would have used a day like today to train indoors or maybe even taken to pacing around her room. Anything, really, to keep moving.

This afternoon though, she felt relaxed. She had a book in one hand, it was some story that Bow recommended. It was interesting, she supposed. It was about a legendary hero from ages past in Bright Moon. Unfortunately, she found out that when one had lived through the same (or similar) journey as the hero in the story, it can get… predictable.

Catra was lounging right beside her, reading her own book. She was just about curled up by her side. Adora's other arm was tucked up under her. Her shoulder and bicep acting as a pillow, while she pulled Catra close. Just enough to keep her warm… It was cold today and Adora knew that she usually ran hot and Catra always seemed to run cold, so if being this close helped to keep Catra warm then… Well… It seemed to be helping at least. Catra seemed content.

The low rumbling of her purr almost rivaled the constant noise of the thunder outside. Almost(italic). Sometimes, after a particular bright flash of lightning, the resulting thunder would be loud enough to actually shake the castle.

The first time it happened, Catra and Melog jumped (it startled Adora as well but upon seeing their reactions to it, she tried to mentally prepare herself for the next time). She immediately pulled Catra closer, even if it wasn't a real threat, she seemed to appreciate the gesture. Her purring got louder after that.

Catra's tail was draped lazily across Adora's legs. Melog curled up on both of their legs, eyes closed, seemingly content. They didn't purr like Catra. But their mane was that light blue color that Adora usually associated with them feeling relaxed.

Adora had her blue jacket on today. She had it on most days actually. She didn't always need it, especially back in the summer when the weather was too balmy and the days were sometimes too sunny. Too bright. For some reason though, it was hard to take the jacket off. It was hard to keep the jacket off. It was a gift from Catra and it felt… special.

Wearing it felt like a part of Catra was always with her. Knowing that Catra thought enough about her to go with Glimmer and get her this… Well… It made her feel special.

The red jacket was iconic. Was. For some reason though, it didn't look(italic) like her. It didn't feel like her. Not anymore. At least not the her of today.

It was strange. Sometime between being given that jacket in the Horde as a cadet, to the days after she officially became Etheria's hero, she felt a change. Like she wasn't the same person who once wore that particular jacket every day. She was both proud and a little sad about that.

She also found that she liked who she was now though. She didn't dislike who she was in the past. She left the Horde, decided to do what she believed was right. She also left Catra though. She would probably never forgive herself for that. But at the same time, she had to help the Rebellion. She had to–

"Hey."

A single clawed finger poked her forehead. Adora lowered the book, turning her head to glance at Catra. Her brow was furrowed. Her mismatched eyes held flickers of concern.

Catra watched her for a moment. Almost like she was studying her. Trying to read her mind. She wasn't sure how, but Catra just always seemed to know when something was bothering her. When her thoughts became too much.

The silence lingered between them for just a bit more. Their eyes locked. Adora wondered for a moment if she should say something. Maybe Catra was wait–

"You good?" Catra asked, her voice soft but also rough from not speaking for most of the day.

They spoke for a bit after they got up and during the late breakfast (though it probably should have been lunch) with Glimmer and Bow. The two of them left shortly after to spend the day with Bow's parents. The silence that settled between them when they returned to their room was comfortable.

"Yeah," Adora answered, flashing a slight smile.

Catra's gaze softened. She still didn't look thoroughly convinced though. Seriously, could Catra read her mind? Catra finally moved her claw, returning her attention to her book once more. Adora brought her book back up. Before she could find her last sentence though, Catra interrupted her.

"By the way," Catra began, her tone sounding weirdly nonchalant.

Adora lowered her book again and glanced at Catra. Her attention was still on her book though. Her tail began to thump against Adora's legs.

"...Yes…"

"Yes to…" Adora began to ask, her words trailed off. She hadn't a clue what Catra was saying yes about. Wait. Could she actually–

"Yes. I can read your mind," Catra answered boredly. Her attention still seemingly on the book in her hands.

Adora's eyes widened. Catra chuckled beside her. Adora smiled. It was crazy. A few years ago, her plan had been to defeat the Rebels. Conquer Bright Moon. Basically conquer Etheria. Then that changed. Her whole life changed really.

After that, she wasn't sure if she and Catra would ever be on the same side again. If they would walk beside each other. And not stand on opposite sides of a war neither had really asked to a part of.

There were a few, fleeting moments, during the war, before everything with Prime where she hoped. Hoped that her and Catra wouldn't be enemies anymore. Hoped that sometime after the war, her and Catra could reunite and everything would go back to the way it was… or close to it, at least.

Catra was wearing that red jacket she noticed. She'd been wearing that a lot, Adora noted. She could see why. Red was surprisingly a good color on her. Well… Maybe not surprising. She couldn't really think of anything that Catra really looked bad in.

There was something about that jacket though. It looked so familiar… She tried to focus on her book again but her thoughts kept going back to Catra.

Catra was nice enough to give her this new, blue jacket. Maybe she should give Catra something in return. A gift to let her know that she was thinking of her as well. With the storm going on outside, she really didn't want to get out though. She was sure that Catra wouldn't want her to get up either. She was still nestled beside her, tucked safely and warmly under Adora's free arm, purring contently, if softly.

Adora wasn't sure if Catra would even want a new jacket. Clearly she liked this red one, wherever(italic) she got it from. Why did it look so, so familiar? A thought occurred to her then… It was probably stupid.

She really didn't need two jackets now, did she? She preferred this one over the old one. Maybe she could give her old one to Catra? Would Catra even want it though? Would she think that was weird?

Catra brought her a new jacket. And here she was thinking about gifting her a used, torn up jacket. Yeah. It probably was stupid. It was truly a horr–

"You good?"

Catra's voice brought her out of her spiraling thoughts again. Second time today. Second time in an hour, really. It was still nowhere close to their current record sadly.

"Yeah," Adora sighed, and she placed her book on the windowsill nearby. Catra glanced at her quizzically.
"Um…"

Should she just offer the jacket? Catra seemed to really like the one she had on now. Maybe she wouldn't want her old one. Or worse, maybe she would accept it but only to be polite. Maybe–

"Seriously," Catra's voice pulled her out of her internal panic once again, "are you okay?"

She looked puzzled and concerned. Adora was vaguely aware of the tail thumping against her legs. Melog had woken up now and was staring at her as well. They were still curled up, but their head was raised and they watched her sleepily.

"Yeah. Yeah," replied Adora, she tried to wave off her concern. It didn't help. Catra still looked worried. "I just…"

Maybe she should go to her closet, grab the old tattered jacket and offer it to Catra. Even if she never wore it, maybe Catra would appreciate the gesture. Maybe she should take it as a keepsake at least. Maybe.

Adora carefully snaked her arm out from under Catra and moved to sit up. Catra frowned at the sudden switch and moved to sit up as well. Melog's mane flashed red but only for a moment.

"I'm just gonna get something," Adora explained quickly. She slid off the window seat and hurried to the closet.

"What are you–?" Catra asked, but the words died off as Adora practically sprinted to the closet. She swung the door open and quickly began to search through the closet.

"Adora…?"

"Yeah. Hold on…" Adora mumbled, hurriedly searching through the closet.

It should be in here. Somewhere. When did they get so many clothes? She pushed the different clothes (seriously, when did they get so many? Did Glimmer just buy them some and just put them in here…?) around, searching for one in particular.

"Seriously, Adora, what are you doing?"

She couldn't find it. She put it in here months ago. She was sure of it. She vividly remembered it. Did she throw it away and forgot? Did someone else throw it away?

"Seriously, Adora!"

Adora sighed. Apparently she wasn't going to offer Catra the old jacket after all. It was a dumb idea anyway, she supposed. Truly stupid. Maybe it missing saved her some embarrassment, Catra probably wouldn't have wanted the old thing anyway, as tattered as it was. She probably only would have accepted it to be nice.

She backed out of the closet and shut the door. She turned, so that she now faced Catra and Melog, who were several paces away. Catra was sitting on the window seat now, her expression puzzled. Melog had gotten up at one point, turned their body so that they would better watch her as she searched the closet. They were lying down again, watching her like Catra was and blinking sleep away.

“What were you doing?” Catra asked, curiously.

“I was…” Adora began to explain, then another thought occurred to her.

She didn’t have the jacket. She did have something else though. Again, it would be a gift that was old. Something previously used but maybe(italic) Catra would appreciate it. It was apparently made of real gold (at least Glimmer and Angella told her it was), so it was valuable. She moved to the dresser now, wordlessly. Catra watched, her confused expression only growing.

The pin. At least that wasn’t missing. At least she could give Catra this, at least. She carefully picked it up from the dresser and went back to the window seat, she didn’t sit down though.

Catra’s ears twitched. Her tail flickered behind her. Melog tilted their head.

“I wanted to give you something since you got me…” Adora gestured at her the blue jacket she was wearing with the hand that wasn’t currently holding the pin. “This.”

“I’m glad you like it,” Catra purred. She gave Adora a soft smile. Adora returned it with her own.

“Anyway. I was going to give you… Well, offer you… My old jacket,” Adora explained, she began to stammer though, “But well… That was probably stupid. I mean you got me something new and I was just going to give you some ragged old–”

“Adora,” Catra said gently.

"Sorry!" Adora replied quickly, "Um… Anyway. I couldn't find it for some reason."

Catra closed her mouth as if she was going to say more but elected to let Adora finish speaking.

"I don't know if I threw it away," she continued, and then in a lower voice added, "or if maybe Glimmer finally made good on her threat to toss it. Seriously, she's been threatening to get rid of that thing for years now and–"

Catra held a hand up, stopping her from continuing. The puzzled look on her face was gone now, replaced by something else. Amusement?

"Okay, stop. Can you please explain what you are talking about?"

"Oh! Um… I was going to…" It was a lame idea. It really was. In a lower voice she continued, "I was going to offer you my old jacket."

Catra's eyes went wide. Her tail stopped flickering and her ears shot straight up. She looked… surprised?

"Look," Adora sighed, looking anywhere but Catra now, "I know it was a lame idea. I mean it's so old. It's torn up from the war. But I–"

"Adora…"

"I wanted to give you something! So…" she glanced at Catra and reached her hand out, offering the golden pin. "I want you to have this. It was given to me by… Well, it doesn't matter who gave it to me. I wore it all throughout the war. Maybe you would…" Her words trailed off.

Maybe even giving her the pin was a stupid idea. Maybe this whole thing was stupid.

"Or," she backtracked and glanced away again, her hand was still reaching out. Catra might take it. Of course, she might only take it to be polite. Maybe she should just ask Glimmer to go with her tomorrow to find Catra something.
"Or… If you don't want it–"

"Adora," Catra's voice was soft. Adora looked back at her. She was grinning.

"Adora," she continued, there was a hint of laughter in her voice now, "Do you not see what I'm wearing right now. Have you not noticed what I've been wearing for months now?"

Adora took a moment and studied Catra. She studied the red jacket that Catra currently wore. Looking at it now, she realized that it was quite tattered. There was even a spot on the side that looked like it had been sewn up.

Wait.

Was that…?

"Wait?" Adora said suddenly.

"Yup." Catra's smile grew. Her tail flickered behind her again. Melog, sensing the relaxing atmosphere, laid their head back down and closed their eyes. Content to return to their nap.

"I will take that pin too though," she added smugly. She reached out and took it from Adora's outreached, opened hand.

"When did you…?" Adora began to ask, puzzled at how she could possibly miss that. Did she seriously just not change her outfit that often?

"Um… Just… Just a bit before I got you that blue one," Catra answered as she pined the golden emblem to the red jacket.

"I kind of figured that giving you that one would make it easier when I told you I stole this one."

Adora couldn’t stop the chuckle that escaped. Stole. This whole time, Catra thought she stole the red jacket. Adora would have gladly given it to her. If Catra had asked and even if she didn’t ask (which she didn’t, not really), Adora was still prepared to give it to her. As a token. A keepsake.

“And when were you going to tell me you stole it?” Adora asked, an eyebrow raised curiously.

“Um…” It was Catra’s turn to hesitate now. Adora crossed her arms, a smug smile now on her face.

“When you asked for it. Or asked about it," she stammered out the answer and then quietly added, "I guess.”

Adora snickered. “I would have given it to you, you know?”

“Yeah but… Where’s the fun in that?” Catra replied, her smile almost matching Adora’s large grin.
