Truce

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/41475597.

Rating:
Mature

Archive Warning:
Graphic Depictions Of Violence

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Catra (She-Ra)

Characters:
Adora (She-Ra), Catra (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Alternate Universe - Canon Divergence, Obsessive Behavior, Romantic Fluff, Flirting, They actually talk with each other, It must be the first time

Language:
English

Stats:
Published: 2022-09-04 Words: 10,632 Chapters: 1/1

Truce

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/41475597.

Rating:
Mature

Archive Warning:
Graphic Depictions Of Violence

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Catra (She-Ra)

Characters:
Adora (She-Ra), Catra (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Alternate Universe - Canon Divergence, Obsessive Behavior, Romantic Fluff, Flirting, They actually talk with each other, It must be the first time

Language:
English

Stats:
Published: 2022-09-04 Words: 10,632 Chapters: 1/1

Truce

by Wooden_doll

Summary

After five years of endless fight between the horde and the rebelion, the force commander Catra receives a letter from Adora.
It's surelly not a trap.

Notes

That's my second time trying to write something in english, probably didn't go better than the first one.
Also... I feel I should warn that this isn't my perspective of a healthy relationship, but it's not suppose to be. Adora and Catra went throug so much that would be a miracle if they're fine in the head . They're not, and it shows.

See the end of the work for more notes

It had been five years. Five years of constant struggle, in which not a week went by without one of them coming back covered with wounds, to be mended in an infirmary. For Adora, that meant spending a night in bed, surrounded by concerned friends and kind words. Catra also had them in Scorpia and, in her own strange way, Entrapa, but it always looked darker to her. In the horde, wounds were treated as efficiently and impersonally as possible, and even being a Force Commander did not grant her greater privileges.

After expelling her own very worried second-in-command and denying for the tenth time any bizarre experiments that Entrapa had suggested with her – "I only need one drop! A drop of your blood, you lose liters every week, what's another drop?!" – only an empty, dark and dusty room that used to belong to the Shadow Weaver was left. At that point, it was covered with her things, a change of clothes lying on the floor; the clean and sanitized uniforms in the closet; a fragment of She-ra's broken sword, which she kept as a trophy, next to her badge. Her scent permeated the entire room, dimly lit by the black light of the Black garnet, but that didn't seem to make it hers.

Even though Shadow Weaver had been dead for two years, succumbing to a mixture of injuries she and Adora had inflicted, her shadows still seemed to loom over that room. If she closed her eyes and concentrated, she could still hear her whispering voice, saying unintelligible things that resonated in the foundations, she just didn't know if in the room or in her own mind. In a odd way, it was almost comforting, like an open wound she didn't want to heal.

Five years was a long time to brood over old hurts, but that pain had taken up so much of her, for so long, that she was afraid to discover there was nothing left. If she let herself empty, if she stopped feeling angry... what would be left of her? What would Catra be if she left everything behind, as Adora had asked her so many times? When all her substance boiled down to this, how could she hope to survive, bereft of it?

Adora...

That name echoed in her, from the inside out, from top to bottom. It seemed to turn her inside out and pierce her, slowly and painfully, fast and convulsively. Adora was like a chronic illness, like the morning sun, her sight and hearing, her heart and her blood, all her thoughts. Adora lived in and through her, past and present, and she was afraid of a future where she wasn't there.

“I love fighting with you” – she had said, on any given day. The memory would have already become dull, lost among so many days the same, one another, if it weren't for that revolting and contradictory statement. She couldn't remember exactly why they'd fought, but Catra had run off to a high corner to think and watch the horizon, as she always did. There were too many of them in the Fright Zone, and it would be impossible to find her in a useful time —which made them so safe to spill in the first place.

Impossible, unless it was Adora, of course. As if she had a nose as good as hers, she seemed to be able to sniff her out wherever she was, and soon the old crane was scrambling up, landing with a dry thud and a “phew” that would have made her laugh, if she wasn’t angry. They both sat on the beam, then, balanced on either side of the rope, and an old, unreliable steel cable was the only thing separating them from a seventy-meter fall.

She hated how realizing that made her heart race. Adora was there to her. For her. Would she do this for other people? Was there anyone else who could willingly make her dance on a razor's edge like that?

Catra was afraid the answer would be yes.

I love to fight with you...

Maybe it hadn't even been said that way, and maybe the word was argue, not fight, Catra couldn't quite remember the details. She didn't respond well, however, ignoring it as Adora staggered after her, begging her to let her explain. Both did not see each other for the rest of the day, and the next they were tacitly unaware of what had happened. They went back to treating each other as usual, walking together in the hallway and sharing aggressive affections, because the gentle ones were too dangerous in that place.

She didn't exactly know why she was torturing herself with those memories, so suddenly, when her time would be more fruitfully spent planning the next military incursion. The horde and the rebellion were in a stalemate that lasted nearly a year now, lashing out aggressively at each other across the smallest patches of frontier, slamming through outposts and rebuilding the destroyed ones. More and more cadets were sent to the front lines and a fresh supply was snatched from the conquered villages, where the horde's banners fluttered aggressively in the morning wind. Some even signed up voluntarily now, as the propaganda of their certain victory became more widespread.

Like two hungry dogs fighting over chunks of bone. Both sides were exhausted, and in the short time they retreated, they were busy licking their wounds to advance again, claws raised and fangs gleaming. The constant struggle had made them tired, listless, and even Adora seemed to have lost that bright youth of hers, her clawed face surveying the battlefield with the exhausted experience of a veteran.

That, more than anything else, hurt. Catra knew she'd stolen so much from her, but corrode away such a fundamental part of her own personality, in the friction of her rancor, so slowly and steadily, hurt her more than any scar her claws could provide. She had not escaped unscathed, of course. Her own body was scarred by the sword point, from face to shins, and one kidney had been rendered useless by sword fragments which, according to the Horde doctors, was too risky to remove. Maybe it was masochism, but she liked that, that there were tangible shards of Adora inside her.

Receiving an offer of truce the next day made those thoughts strangely prophetic. Scorpia handed it over in secret, as it had been given to her, apparently, and it wasn't a formal letter from the resistance. Written in Adora's handwriting, it asked for a meeting between the two, no escorts, no weapons, just a polite invitation to talk.

"It's a trap," Scorpia said, and it certainly looked like one, perhaps too obvious.

If Adora tried something sneaky, it would surely be like that, wouldn't it? She was terrible at subtleties like that, but the current war climate seemed to call for extraordinary measures. What would be there? Undercover agents, ready to capture her? Did she really expect Catra to be foolish enough to agree to something like this?

No, of course she wasn't.

"Coordinate the rest of the forces for a day, Scorpia."

"Sure, what are you going to do?"

She waved the paper in response.

"What, are you really going?"

She smiled in response, and the scar that split her face in two arched, until it disappeared at the base of her neck.

"I don’t mean to question your authority, but what if...

"So, you'll just have to rescue me, won't you?"

That ended the matter, and Catra was now on a skiff, advancing towards the whispering forest. The location had been chosen carefully, and not without consideration, she thought to herself. It was outside the forest and the territory of BrightMoon, on a small flaw in the map that technically belonged to no one. The cliffs were barren and high, and there was nothing noteworthy there to justify taking it, the very effort involved would be beyond what the place had to offer.

Adora, as Catra expected, but didn't really believe, was alone. It was too early for games, it seemed, and part of her was glad that her honesty had survived, however cynically, the entire struggle. Dressed in civilian clothes, she was seated at a table set, in front of a dome of polished steel that covered, she could only guess, a meal – or a concealed weapon? If she had been in her shoes, that's what she would have done.

She stand up as Catra emerged from the path, bowing in an elegant way that was more aimed at her rank than her person, but Catra liked that. Years in the past, maybe she'd responded with a snarky comment, the hurt and hate too fresh and unripe, to be polite, but she could put those feelings aside now.

“It was a surprise to receive your note”

“I can imagine, the day before I had the idea, I would have felt that way too” - she replied, and approached carefully.

They both watched each other for a long minute, their gestures so minimal and measured that the tension was palpable between them. Finally, Adora came forward, slowly, and pulled out the chair for her. Catra sat down.

“Are we here for business?”

"A proposal, actually," Adora said, sitting down herself and uncorking a bottle of wine, which was resting in a bucket of already half-melted ice.

“I didn't know you drank”

“Only on special occasions” - she poured a glass and held it out – “The same for you?”

“More often, I imagine.”

“Do they still use vodka as an anesthetic in the infirmary?”

"Same old vintage, actually, but it's gotten good with time." She took a sip, sighing. Wine was a rare commodity in the Fright Zone, and this one looked especially good – “some cadets are geting hurt on purpose, to try.”

“Sounds like something you would do.”

“Too bad I never had the idea” – she leaned back in her chair, crossing her legs and sending an intense look to her – “What is your proposal? From your tone, I can tell it has nothing to do with the war.”

-No, it's... personal - Adora took a sip too, seeming to need some time to think more than anything else - One day. I want a one-day truce.

-What do you hope to achieve in a single day?

-It's not a truce between the rebellion and the horde - she added, a little hesitantly - Glimmer is commanding the troops now. I take it you left the same orders with Scorpia?

-Yes... this is between us, then?

-Yeah. A day of truce is all I ask.

-And then?

-Afterwards, I imagine, we'll fight again - Adora said, and the fact that she almost didn't look devastated by it was a testament to how used she was to that routine - You will lead the horde, I will lead the rebellion. We'll meet in a few days' time somewhere, yet to be determined, and we'll try to kill each other like we always do. We may or may not be succed, and we will continue next week.

Catra allowed, for a moment, the weariness to cross her features, and the fact that it was still comfortable to do so, with Adora, almost made her laugh.

-One day looks good - she took the rest of the wine, and held out the glass - Until dusk, let's not mention the rebellion or the horde, we're just Catra and Adora.

They both smiled at each other then, and the curves of their lips only deepened as the idea took on substance and her mind raced through the possibilities. Adora seemed to come to the same conclusion, because her eyes almost glowed, and it wasn't the dangerous glow indicating She-ra's arrival. The claw marks that adorned her cheeks curved around her cheekbones, a close match to the ones that marred her bare shoulders, leaving her bra straps showing beneath her wool blouse.

Now that they had a day with each other, she let her eyes wander, realizing only out of the corner of her eye that the general of the rebellion was doing the same thing. Dressed in pants and boots, with heels, and a blouse loose around the valley of her breasts, she was distinctly attractive, perfumed and with light traces of makeup on her face. Catra felt a little self-conscious, still in the uniform, and allowed herself to laugh at that.

“You should have specified that it was a casual occasion, I would have changed my clothes”

“The idea crossed my mind, but I didn't think you'd react well to it” - she replied, with a lovely shade of pink on her cheeks – “Besides, I hardly have time to appreciate how good you look in that uniform, so it doesn't hurt.”

“Oh, I didn't know you were looking at me all this time.”

“When have I ever done something different?”

Maybe it was the wine, maybe it was the occasion, or maybe it was how little time they had there, but Catra stood up and swiveled in place, opening her arms to expose the curve of her waist. The bold gesture seemed to fit the truce between them well, when unthinkable most of the time, and the way Adora's eyes latched, almost magnetized, to the curve of her hips and thighs made it more than worth it.

"You're so beautiful…" she said, and swallowed perceptibly.

"And you're still terrible at flirting." Catra laughed, genuinely, and the act could have scratched her throat, as unusual as it was.

“Me? Even I know you should say something like ‘Thanks, Adora, you too’, but of course not” – she rolled her eyes – “I even put eyeshadow on for you...”

“Did you? I can’t see...”

“I chose a light tone.”

“Are you sure you just didn't use the dry brush, thinking there was something on it?”

“No” - she said, and leaned over the table – “Here, see.”

“Oh... you're really wearing make-up” – Catra laughed with pleasure – “Adora with make-up? Who are you and what did you do with my best friend?”

She almost sat up after that, and it almost felt awkward. She almost cursed herself for letting it slip, so out of turn, when her words were so measured but so true, and she almost regretted having agreed to this meeting. Stupid, stupid! Stupid Adora, beautiful and fragrant; stupid meeting, so out of place; stupid Catra, shoving her feet in her mouth like that. She almost regretted it. Almost.

“What?! I can put on makeup!” – Adora replied on the spot, looking so comfortable that it instantly relaxed her, like smothering a candle flame with a glass – “You started wearing lipstick, I can too.”

She had, and had been for almost an year. The lips were outlined in black, however, as was the heavy pencil, around the eyes, and the color was there more to make her intimidating than to enhance whatever beauty she had, but if Adora's eyes, locked in the curve of her shy smile, meaning something, it was that it had worked the wrong way. In the best wrong way possible.

“Heh, sorry, you look really pretty” - she said, finally, trying to calm her idiotic heart that, for some reason, thought it was justified to start hammering in her chest – “You were always pretty, but that color works well on you.”

“Thanks.”

“What is it, by the way?” – She pointed to the tray – “I thought it was a hidden weapon.”

"Of course you thought about that." Adora rolled her eyes, but her smile seemed to have hammered itself into her face, and she didn't think she could get it out of there even if she wanted to.

Taking off the metal dome, she brushed away the steam that condensed in the vault with a gesture and, having nowhere to put it, ended up leaving it on the floor, with an embarrassed blush. Catra chuckled softly, looking now at the two plates stacked on a small stand, which glistened subtly with steam.

“How exquisite...”

It was just baked potatoes and steaks, a good size, drizzled with a sauce of herbs and waxes. They still looked appetizing and, although a little lukewarm, they were tasty. Adora gently extended her plate and abandoned the dish along with the other utensils, gathering dust on the floor. Catra, on a whim, took the wine and poured her another good dose, filling both glasses almost to the brim.

Whatever they did, she wanted the encouragement – and the later excuse – of being mildly tipsy, to help deal with the situation. Adora seemed to agree with her, because she took a big swig, her lips now taking on a pleasant cherry tinge that, not surprisingly, sounded more appetizing than the meat on her plate.

Which, by the way, was delicious. She almost said she would have joined the rebellion from the start if she'd known this was what they ate, but she remembered at the last moment the promise, and swallowed the words hard.

“This is very good, my compliments to the chef...”

“Oh, thanks” - Adora laughed – “I did it.”

“You? Since when do you know how to cook?”

“Since three weeks ago, when I started to practice” - she laughed, and added, in an amused and self-deprecating tone – “I only know how to do this, however, and it's not as good as the BrightMoon cooks who taught me, the meat was for be softer.”

“I think I prefer it this way” - Catra said, and exposed her sharp fangs, after swallowing a mouthful – “I have to put these babies to good use.”

Adora, seeming to barely notice the gesture, put her hand on her shoulder and caressed it. Catra knew she had, under her clothes, a very visible scar from her own fangs there, dotting her collarbone. She thought about apologizing for that, and maybe a lot of other things, but the words cooled in her throat as she noticed that Adora had blushed, and now she was nibbling her bottom lip, seeming lost in thought.

In response, her own stomach seemed to heat up, like a furnace on. Deciding to be bold – because the theme of the day seemed to be doing things they both wouldn't normally do, Catra said:

“Want another one, on the other shoulder?”

Despite the shock on her face, Adora seemed to have come to the same conclusion, because her smile widened as her eyes narrowed. With those blue orbs, glowing in slits and through her eyelashes, she was almost impossibly, unfairly beautiful.

“If there is to be any symmetry between these brands, I prefer it to be vertical...”

Vertical? What is this... Oh... Oh dear. Against her will, her face heated to incandescence, and it was impossible not to look down, wondering what place Adora was suggesting. Could it be her hip? Her thighs?

“Are you okay?” - She laughed, maliciously – “Your face is all red.”

“Who are you to say?” – Catra pointed at her with the knife, spearing a potato on her fork with some cruelty – “You're all pink!”

“I'm pale, any time out of the shade makes me pink.”

“Permanently?”

“When you're with me, yes...”

It was a trap, Catra thought to herself. It was clear now. Adora's evil grand plan was to bring her here, charm her with pretty words, and completely destroy her panties. She didn't think the scrap of fabric between her legs would survive this day unharmed.

And if the savory scent that rolled off Adora in waves, sharing space with the perfume on her shoulders and waist, meant something, her's neither.

"You got bold with age..."

"Stop sounding like I'm some kind of old woman, we're only twenty-four..."

"I tend to forget that, when I look at you."

"Oh, do I look younger?" - She laughed, delighted.

"No, I mean, we're the same age" - Catra smirked – "You look so much closer to thirty..."

"Give me another one of these, and I'll throw my wine at you" - she said, and then laughed – "I saw someone do that in a restaurant, apparently it's a way of showing displeasure."

"Don't waste it..." - she rolled her eyes – "And if you throw it at me, you'll have to lick it."

"Is that an incentive? I'm very tempted to pour my wine on you right now."

"Let me finish eating first, silly..."

By the time the last forkful was consumed, however, the wine had run out. The glasses were barely half full before Adora or Catra refilled them, and the last sip they both shared from the bottle itself. Catra took it first, and tried not to look too fascinated at the tiny trace of black that lingered on Adora's lip, from her lipstick, as she downed the last of the drink.

“Damn, that was good as fuck.”

“Did you just cursed? Twice?” - Catra laughed, pleasantly satisfied – “I'm more convinced by the minute that you're a faker...”

“Well, it's your responsibility to make sure I'm not, then” - she laughed – “Just imagine, I'm somewhere tied up, helpless, while my kidnapper distracts you in an elaborate trap.”

For a second, it crossed her mind to remind her that they were on opposite sides, and this kidnapper could very well be her ally, but the last thing she wanted right now was reminding Adora of that.

“You're right, hmm...” - Catra pretended to think, casting a suspicious and caricatured look at the woman in front of her – “Tell me something that only Adora would know, Ms. Imposter”

And, if there had been any real suspicion of it, the little snort that escaped in Adora's laughter would have completely allayed her worries. She put her hand to her mouth, embarrassed, but soon she was laughing again.

“Remember that time you hid my pants, while I slept, to make me late for training?”

“The captain was angry with you for being taken by surprise” - she laughed, with pleasure – “I think it was the first time I was openly praised? I remember it well.”

“It wasn't the first time” - Adora corrected her, also laughing – “We had six or seven, I think, and one captain complimented you with another for the way you climbed. I only heard it by accident.”

“I don't really like the idea of someone looking at my ass and praising me for it...”

"I don't think that's what he meant, he looked really impressed" - she replied, turning her empty glass with a lost, distracted, at ease look. Catra felt warm that they were still able to let their guard down, with each other, even after all – “At least that one time, I've seen other people looking at you when you climb...”

“Oh, is that jealousy in your voice?”

“Of course” - she admitted openly – “But honestly, I can't even blame them, you always wore tight pants”

“They are more comfortable!” - she stretched a portion of the elastic fabric, on the thighs – “Baggy pants feels weird. Besides, who are you to tell me that?”

“What, it was the standard uniform! You who wore stylized clothes.”

“Of course, the standard uniform for people three sizes smaller than you.”

“Are you implying that I'm fat?”

“Fat? No... chubby, perhaps?”

Adora was not, however. As a child, she was chubby and stocky, but puberty had made her slender and well-built, with lovely curves and lean muscles that, truthfully, even in the midst of battle—and perhaps especially in these situations—Catra could watch untiringly, all the day.

“Says the girl who looked like a furball..”.

“I was a child, it's normal for magicats” – she shrugged – “we lose hair as we get older.”

“What, seriously?”

“Yes, you never noticed?”

“I thought you shaved!”

“You're an idiot” - Catra rolled her eyes, affectionately – “They get smaller and thinner in adolescence, and completely fall off, except for the tail, in adulthood.”

“You don't have belly fur anymore?” - Adora looked genuinely stunned by this, and since she wouldn't have another chance, Catra lifted her shirt, almost to the limit of her breasts, to expose her own stomach. Unlike Adora, her muscles had never become pronounced enough to overcome the smoothness of her skin, so her waist tapered, in a gentle depression, to the curves of her hips. If the red that tinged Adora's cheeks was any indication, she found it quite attractive – “I don't know how to deal with it, I enjoyed stroking your fur so much...”

Hesitantly, she leaned across the table and held out her hand. She looked ready to pull it back at the slightest sign of discomfort, but Catra did the opposite. Rising, she approached her, until she felt the general's digits caressing the curve of her navel.

“Are you still sorry?”

“It's so soft...” - she didn't even seem to hear her question, and Catra bit her lip pleasantly at that - I've always been jealous of your waist...

“Yours is also narrow now” - Catra shrugged, biting her tongue to keep from moaning, even more so when the fingers went down, dangerously close to her groin, where the heat had tripled in intensity – “I was jealous of your muscles.”

“Serious? I thought they made me ugly...”

“You're kidding, right?”

“No, well, I know some people find it attractive, but wasn't it... unfeminine, so to speak?”

“Ah, they're very feminine, don't worry about that - Catra said - With half the population of Etheria drooling on your muscles daily, I thought you'd be proud of them.”

“That's not as welcome as you make it sound...”

“Oh no?”

“Not from them”

It was implied enough, so Catra let herself look at it for a few more moments. The wool blouse had risen as Adora leaned across the table, and now a sizable, almost glistening swath of the very pale skin of her stomach was exposed. Her abdomen wasn't as defined as a man's would be, but that was for lack of the characteristic bulk rather than the effort involved. They hugged her waist, though, tight and attractive muscles, and Catra felt a shiver as she imagined how they would feel on her tongue.

“What other things were you jealous of?”

Catra expected Adora to say nothing, that there was nothing attractive about her other than her slim, elegant figure, but when their eyes met again, Adora blushed adoringly. She sat down again, even though she had pulled the chair to the side, and she did the same, until they were more side by side than opposite each other. Hesitantly close like that, Catra wanted so badly to reach out and take her hand, but she didn't dare do that.

“Do you promise not to laugh?”

“Just saying that, I'm almost laughing.”

“Come on, don't be mean...”

“Okay, okay, I won't laugh. Happy now?”

“Very” - Adora nodded, and seemed to almost want to lean her head on her shoulder, but the distance between them prevented that, and she rested her head on the back of her hand instead – “I was always jealous...”

“Yes...” - Catra said, and used the excuse of getting closer to listen to put her chair right next to her, close enough so that, if Adora wanted, she could try one more time – “I promised I wouldn't laugh, remember?”

“... of your tail.”

Oh. Catra did not expect this.

“My tail?”

Adora nodded, her face burning scarlet so bright it would be silly to question her sincerity. Timidly, she approached her, until her cheek touched Catra's shoulder, and then more, until her face was buried in the crook of her neck. The act was so explosively satisfying that she couldn't stop herself from purring softly, and almost forgot what they were talking about.

“Why?” - She asked, after a few seconds of silence, because Adora didn't seem inclined to explain herself.

When she was young, her tail and ears were sensitive points in her self-esteem – if she had any self-esteem, back then. They were what set her apart from everyone else and, in her childish mind, what kept her from being loved by Shadow Weaver, and more than once she entertained the thought of cutting them off. She was grateful, however, that she'd never had the guts to do this, because the thought of any appreciation for the sorceress these days just filled her mouth with gall.

She wished she'd realized sooner that her approval was neither important or welcome. It would have stopped her and Adora from bringing each other so much pain...

"I don't really know how to explain it" - Adora shrugged, the movement taking her higher, almost to the point where she could accidentally kiss her neck, but Catra wasn't quick enough to crouch down in sync - "I like it, and how it sways when you walk..."

"You mean you've been looking at my butt?"

"I thought we had already established that?" - Adora laughed.

"I used to hate it..."

"I know" - Adora said – "It's part of why I never told you that."

"Do you want to touch it?"

"Can I?" She looked up, and her eyes almost gleamed with desire. Catra tried very hard to keep the purr from shaking her all over, because it would be too embarrassing.

In response, she flicked her tail and gently placed it in Adora's outstretched hands. Having a person holding it was invasive, and she almost growled instinctively, but it was also intimate and satisfying, and in the hands of someone she trusted, it could send her almost immediately into a sleepy spiral where thoughts made little sense.

It was as shocking to discover these things as it was to realize that, even after all, she still trusted Adora with something like this.

Adora who, like her, seemed to have lost herself in her own spiral of sensations. Her fingers were impossibly gentle and delicate as they stroked her tail, running all the way from base to tip and back, ruffling her hairs to arrange them later. Her face was flushed and her lips parted, and she almost glowed with joy, as if she were fulfilling a wish that had lingered for years.

“It’s so fluffy!”

“Not everything about me is soft, don't get used to it.”

“I know” - she replied, with a smile – “But I like your sharp parts too.”

And boldly, she took her hand in hers, stretching Catra’s fingers through hers to the claws. Catra exposed them again, instinctively, and Adora traced their entire length with her fingertips, until she pressed the digits into the sharp point, gently enough not to break even the first layer of skin, but still sink into her flesh, soft and very sensitive. She pinched them and traced them again, eyes locked on the naturally black surface, while her other hand continued to stroke her tail, which had curled around her wrist.

Catra's eyes watered against her will. Here was the person she'd hurt for years, with those claws, touching her with a kindness she'd never experienced before.

"A-Adora, I..." she started, not sure what she was going to say, and she looked up, curious. Something on her face must have given it away, because she smiled and let go of her hand, bringing a finger to her lips and tenderly shushing her.

“Truce, remember? We can work this out later, however we do it.”

Truce, yes, it's true. They had the day to themselves, all and just for them. Swallowing the apology, she looked around and tried to clear her head.

“So, did you plan something else?”

Not that she wasn't perfectly happy—and it almost scared her how happy she was, in fact—to sit with her on that rock all day, but Adora apparently had other ideas, because she got up soon after.

“My ship is down there” - she said, having long since stopped referring to it as Mara's ship – “Can we go for a ride if you want?”

Had she been more attentive, she probably would have realized that if there was a trap, it would be there. In that sentence, in that invitation, in that ship. Weaken her first, make her vulnerable, and then attack unexpectedly. Catra was beyond thinking rationally, however, and followed her unsuspectingly as they both headed down the trail. Adora slipped more than once on her heels, and Catra laughed, helping her cross the trails with a hand in her waist.

When they reached the bottom, they were holding hands. The ship's door opened...

And it was empty, not a trap. Even though she never thought of it, the fact that she trusted Adora this time was something she would always be grateful for.

The controls lit up as Adora entered, bluish traces of circuitry that made up the vehicle's own engineering, pulsing like a metallic heart. Darla, whom Entrapta had named, opened her eyes, in the form of an illuminated panel that momentarily covered the forest with holograms, visible beyond the reinforced glass that separated them from the outside.

“Welcome, Adora.”

“Hi Darla” - she replied – “Start the engines and get us out of the atmosphere, plot the lowest stable orbit you can.”

“Calculating...” - the ship replied, its voice pleasant and only subtly mechanized – “The lowest possible height, without complications, is seven hundred and fifteen kilometers, what is the desired angulation?”

“Surprise me.”

"Wow, you've really incorporated the interstellar captain thing," -

Catra said, a little awkwardly. There was only one chair visible, in the center of the command deck.

“Want to do the honors?” – Adora said, and pointed exactly at it.

“Where are you going to sit?”

"I might have an idea…" she said, and had the gall to blink.

As soon as Catra was comfortable, Adora put her hand on her shoulder and jumped into her lap, knocking the air out of her lungs. She moved her hands instinctively to cup her waist, and Adora shifted onto her side, legs on the armrests and back braced, sideways, against her chest. In that position, her face was very close to hers, and their blushes seemed to feed on each other, in a cycle of shared heat.

"That wine had too much alcohol to make you like that," she teased in response, because she needed to think about something other than all the places where their bodies touched, and in particular, Adora's butt against her thighs, so soft and...

Potatoes. tanks. Entrapta spinning in the chair. Screwdriver. Hordak's Laboratory. Shadow Weaver on a date.

Okay, it wasn't working...

"It might have given me a little courage, yes" Adora leaned closer to her, and only didn't purr because she was biologically incapable of it – “but the will was always there.”

OK. Wow. Catra didn't know if she could handle it.

The ship rise so smoothly that it was as if an invisible hand picked it up, like a toy, and set it down again, on an invisible track that circled the reddish globe that, in the distance, was all she could see of Etheria. From that height, it was hard to believe that there was a war dividing the planet, clouds were moving in the vast mass of air below, and rivers continued their perpetual motion, completely indifferent to the territories they separated. It was easy to forget her troubles up there, so high up, resting on a sea of distant stars, with the girl she loved humming happily in her lap, and she was grateful for the chance.

At least for today.

-“You are so beautiful” - Adora said, suddenly, sincerity and admiration overflowing her, her eyes locked on hers from inches away – “I never forget, but it still surprises me every time.”

“I missed looking at you like that” - she replied, even though doing so was reserved for the nights, when Catra stretched out beside her and watched her sleep, silently, ready to slip away to the foot of the bed if she woke up – “I always loved your eyes.”

“Yours are prettier.”

"They're scary," she said, well aware of how many people trembled as she clenched them.

"No, they're not," Adora said, pulling her gently even closer, her irises so wide they looked like wells, as if she wanted to pull in all the light she could and imprint Catra's face in her memory – “Sometimes you are, but never your eyes.”

“I don't know if I like that you think I'm scary...”

“Oh?” – Adora smiled widely – “Isn't that what you always wanted?”

Okay, that hurt. A lot. Adora seemed to have noticed, and clung to her tightly, as if to keep her from running away – it wasn't like she really had anywhere to go now, did it?

“I didn't mean it like that! Argh, I'm so bad at this!” – She pressed her face into her neck – “I don't mean that you scare me or anything, it's... like...”

“You're still as stupid as ever...”

"I know, I'm sorry..." - She seemed to almost deflate in her lap, and Catra cursed herself, and the parents she'd never met, for being equally bad at saying what she really thought.

“We agreed, remember? Let's be honest with each other today” – she said, even though she knew it was never explicitly in the deal – “Truce, isn't it?”

“Truce” – Adora laughed, sadly, in response – “I mean you are strong. You can be scary if you want to, because you're strong enough to enforce any threat you make, and you're determined, and dangerous, and incredible...

“Incredible?” She raised an eyebrow, a smirk slowly returning to her face.

Adora blushed once more.

“Do you remember... and I'm not saying this to make you feel bad, but do you remember in the crystal palace, when you let me fall?”

As if Catra could forget, even if she wanted to. Intuiting it in her expressions, Adora continued.

“I said I never thought of you as the second best, because to me you are the best - she settled more comfortably on her lap – “I always trained, so, so much, and yet it was enough to just be almost as good as you, and you never had to try too hard, you just are so fucking strong. Whatever anyone threw at you, you took it without taking a step back, while I had to bend to Shadow Weaver to survive every day, it was so humiliating...”

Catra blinked, more stunned than she ever remembered being.

Was that what Adora thought? That wasn't even close to reality.

“Is that what you think?” – she laughed, but she wasn't happy at all – “I've always been so afraid! Of everything! I've been walking on eggshells my entire life, because any snap could mean I'd be taken from you, or Shadow Weaver would think I was really too useless to even bother to keep me alive!”

"But that's it, isn't it?" – Adora said, turning his eyes to hers again – "That's what Shadow Weaver thought, and we both know she was an idiotic, selfish, waste of a woman. Catra, for God's sake, I had to be She-Ra most of the time, just to survive against you."

“Of course yes, because you really wanted to kill me, didn't you?!” – Catra huffed, rolling her eyes, in response – I've seen you lift tanks, Adora, and throw them like they're matchboxes. You're strong enough to break trees, to split steel in half, don't you think I don't know that you held every punch, all along?

“Of course I held my punches! Any carelessness, any wrong move, I could have...”

“Accidentally beat me?”

“Accidentally killed you, you idiot!” – Adora said, and pulled her ear hard. Catra screamed in fright and prepared to start fighting her, but just by looking into her eyes, filled with tears, her fury faded so fast it felt like it had never been there – “It was never about beating you, but that's not even the point! I needed a magic sword...”

"She-ra is not a sword" - Catra said, and was surprised that her voice sounded more sullen than angry.

“...Okay, I had to transform into my super powerful mountain-decimator alter ego...”

“Okay, now you're just being vain.”

Adora laughed, a tearful, heartfelt, impossibly loving laugh.

“You'll never give me an inch, do you?”

“I think that, in the current juncture of the facts” - She looked to where their bodies touched, joined, as if they never wanted to separate again – “I don't have inches left to give you.”

“I still have some.”

“What?”

In response, Adora kissed her. Of course she kissed her – Catra would have laughed at the stupid joke if she hadn't been, surprisingly, kissing Adora - OK. Calm down. You are kissing the girl of your dreams, who is also your sworn archenemy. No pressure.

The subject slipped out of her mind after that, and it had probably completely slipped out of hers as well, because any understanding they could establish could easily be put off until later, more important things were happening now. Things like Adora's hands on her shoulders, or her mouth on hers, pressing lovingly but hard, until, in a sigh she didn't know which mouth it came from, their lips parted and their mouths snapped together again, strumming and stroking each other.

Adora backed away a little, dizzy, and Catra could have died happy to see her lipstick smearing her mouth.

"Fuck" -she sighed, and Catra almost scoffed at her eloquence, if she hadn't dived in for another kiss.

Whatever the speed of the ship, it was enough to go around the entire planet, until they parted again. Catra caught her bottom lip between her fangs and shivered as Adora whimpered in response, and the sound she made as she sucked on it, her hands rising to her blond locks and pulling her closer to her, was the sweetest song she'd ever heard. She had never heard.

Trembling, Adora pulled her with her, and she wasn't sure where, as she helped her to her feet, her legs—she felt something inside her roar proudly, approvingly—wobbly, as she leaned against her and staggered, still kissing, to any corner. Her teeth chattered against each other and they pulled away, only to laugh at each other, before pulling back together for another kiss, and another, and another.

Adora was subtly taller than she was, less than an inch, but Catra was strong enough that when she suddenly jumped on her, wrapping her legs around her waist and holding her firmly in place, Catra didn't drop her. Her hands went under her thighs, to support them, and they traced a full circle in place, in a few steps, as Adora tugged at her uniform. Her mask fell off somewhere and Catra didn't bother to retrieve it, as a door opened with a pneumatic whir, and they entered the room.

There was, she noticed, another bottle of wine there, in the same ice goblet that, by now, had completely melted.

“Oh…” – Catra blinked, stunned, then a mischievous smile filled her lips – “You came prepared, didn't you?”

Adora blushed adorably, a little shyly, but her smile only widened.

“That's not all, actually...”

“Hmm?”

She move out of her lap in response and took a few seconds to catch her breath. Catra sat comfortably on the bed, barely able to stop herself from jumping on her again as Adora licked her lips and nibbled them, then hurried over to the closet. Her fingers trembled as she entered a simple, three-digit code, and the door opened with the same buzz, revealing a storage space in the wall.

“I thought, I really wanted to... and... like, well” - her voice went up an octave – “It's happening, and we... we really...”

“Breathe, Adora” - Catra said, laughing, trying to disguise that she was equally nervous – “It's not rocket science. We're going to have sex. We've always wanted to, and now we’ll do. Truce, remember?”

“Yes, yes! Okay, I-I'm not nervous” – Catra rolled her eyes – “I-I thought of something else, b-but it doesn't have to happen! I mean, unless you wanted it to happen, but it doesn't have to happen to be good, because it's going to be great, I mean... even without it, and...”

Catra got up and hugged her from behind, gently, putting his head on her shoulder to peek at whatever was in the closet. She blinked, stunned, at the sight of a bunch of ties.

“Do you want to make it formal?”

“What?”

“Well… you brought ties” – she pointed to the pile of cloth, which Adora was staring at with such intensity that they might as well catch fire – “It’s an… I don't know, some tradition in BrightMoon?”

Catra had never had sex, so she wasn't exactly privy to the details.

“I-It's not for that...”

“Then…?”

“It's a blindfold” - she said, licking her lips and taking a deep breath – “And t-ties, to tie the wrists.”

Oh.

Oh?!

“Do you want to tie me then?” - Catra said, trying very hard to avoid sounding hurt. Of course Adora would do that, after all, how could she be comfortable putting herself in this kind of situation, completely vulnerable, with her of all people?

Even if she loved her—and just thinking about it was making her stomach full of butterflies—not even she would be suicidal to the point of…

“They're not for you” - Adora said, turning around in her embrace and looking at her with a confused and embarrassed tenderness, in her eyes – “They're for me.”

It was like tripping and falling on her face, only mentally. Her brain gasped and shut off, and any rational thought process was clouded by a wave of confusion so wide that she actually opened her mouth, dumbfounded, incredulous, and more surprised than she'd ever been in her life.

“Do you want… that I blindfold you – Catra spoke slowly, because the idea was so inconceivable that, for a moment, it was difficult to shape it – “And tie you… your hands?”

“Yes” - Adora said, her voice tiny – “B-But like I said, you don't really need to...”

Catra covered her mouth with her hand, because her nervous chatter would only destroy any chance of understanding what was happening.

“You want me to blindfold you” - she said, so confused that she didn't even remember that she had already asked that question – “And tie you up.”

Adora waved, up and down.

“Why?”

She tried to gesture an explanation, but realized it was impossible and grabbed Catra's wrist, taking her hand gently from in front of her mouth.

“It's complicated.”

“Do not say...”

“No, I mean... it's really for several reasons” - Adora licked her lips – “Partly because I kinda think it's hot...”

“Be tied up and blindfolded?”

“Yeah?”

“Is that a question or an answer?”

“Catra, you are not helping me to clarify things here...”

"Okay, okay, I'll be quiet, just try... try not to make me more confused" - She said, and almost laughed, because what else did Adora do but make her go around in circles around herself?

“I don't think it's appropriate for the first time, like... I'm a virgin, and...”

Okay, cool to drop this bomb out of the blue, as if Catra didn't need days and days to swallow this concept. Adora was a virgin? Would she be her first?!

God, she was blushing like an idiot.

“...but when we did things the standard way, didn't we?” - She laughed, and it took Catra a few more seconds to realize that she'd missed part of the explanation. She just nodded then, not wanting to make her repeat herself when she looked ready to spew the truths of the universe in her face – "And at the same time, I know you hate being vulnerable…"

"And how does that imply that you should be vulnerable?"

Adora moved as if in slow motion then. Her arms came up and wrapped around her back, and she pressed into her slowly, until there was no space between their bodies.

"Because I trust you" - She said – "And I want to give you everything I have."

It would be romantic, maybe even exciting. But Adora carried a map of scars from her claws on her body, so it was offensive.

"Do you trust me?" – Ah, the fury was back. At least Catra knew how to deal with it – "How can you trust me, you're completely senseless?!"

When in doubt, hurt the person who is opening their heart to you, because when did Catra do it differently?! Isn't that what monsters did? Step on people's hopes and dreams and turn them to dust? Make them ashamed of themselves, to the point where they hated them so much that there would be no doubt about their intentions?

Wasn't it better to be sure people meant to hurt her, and be ready for it, than to live with the doubt?

Adora, however, just watched her silently, her face calm and her eyes gleaming with a cold, cutting determination. She moved closer as Catra backed away, ignoring the clawed hands that flailed dangerously close to her face, and again, until it looked like she was the ghoul chasing her, not the opposite.

Catra backed up until her back met the wall, and then Adora held out her hand. She closed her eyes then, expecting a punch or a slap, but felt only a handful of caressing fingers, carefully tracing the scar she had on her face.

“Don't be arrogant, Catra” - she said, in response, and her calm was a balm that washed away her anger – “And don't act like I was the only one who got hurt. I would have a hard time touching any part of you that I haven't already hurt.”

And that was true for both of them, wasn't it? Whether it was a cut, a bruise, or broken bones, they had destroyed themselves to exhaustion, until there was nothing good left between them, but there was, wasn't it? It was there, well guarded and normally hidden, but now exposed, a love so warm it glowed.

“Do you remember when I told you that I liked to fight with you?”

It was an absurd tangent in the conversation, but Catra remembered. It was a memory that came and went, insistent to the point of irritating, and punctuated the periods between their struggles and arguments.

“I remember...”

“You never let me finish, either, remember?”

“Yeah...”

"I like to fight with you" - Adora said, again, and this time she wasn't shy enough not to hug her and glue her body to hers, until all their curves molded into each other, like pieces of a puzzle. head – “Because I like to make amends later.”

“Huh?”

Adora pulled her face to hers and kissed her, slowly and tenderly.

“We both grew up together, we've been best friends since before we knew how to spell our names” - she continued, punctuating her sentences with kisses that ran down her mouth and face, sweet and warm – “We have a bond.”

“We crushed it...”

“No, we tested it, over and over, over and over again, we tested him to exhaustion” - She said, and smiled as that fact amazed her, enlightened her – “And it survived. No matter what was against us, we were still together. We care for each other and we love each other, even when Shadow Weaver, Hordak, the whole world said we should hate each other.”

Tracing her fingers down her back, she found the zipper on her uniform and started to pull it down.

“Even on opposite sides of a war, even if we are laced with hatred and resentment for each other, we still love each other” - she said – “and that makes me so happy.”

"It would be easier if we don’t," Catra said quietly, and part of her realized it was because she was afraid Adora would agree.

But today was truce, and they promised to be honest.

“Perhaps? But it wouldn't be good.” She pulled back a little, and let his nose brush hers. Catra purred pleasantly at the gesture – “Because me loving you isn't as important as the fact that I love to love you, even after all, I don't want that to change because we have such a strong and lasting bond that honestly, how someone else would hope to compare?”

And Adora pulled back a little farther, just enough for their noses to touch, tip to tip, and looked into her eyes. Catra shivered, from head to toe, with the intensity of that look, and all the mixture of memories and feelings contained there. There was hurt and anger between them, of course there was, but they were awash in something so warm and vast it could drown them.

Catra suddenly realized that even now, she would forgive her. Even if at that moment she attack her, gag her, trapped her and escaped, she would forgive her. There was so much love in those eyes that nothing she could do seemed to erase even a fraction of it.

And, as with epiphanies, it hit her like a derailed train. She understood then, why Adora wanted to be tied up and blindfolded, why she wanted to give her full control of a situation where she would be more vulnerable than ever, why no one would be up to doing that to her except Catra, even Glimmer and Bow, even her friends from the rebellion.

Nobody deserves it. No one had a bond with her that had survived the anger, the hurt, the hate. They both set it on fire, doused it with acid and pulled as hard as they could, and in the end, it came back stronger than ever. Unbreakable. Indestructible. Fed for a lifetime with each other, with days and nights, with the raw essence of who they were. That bond couldn't be broken by anything, because it was an inextricable part of who they were, together and apart.

And wasn't that, so utterly and incomparably, the most beautiful thing she'd ever seen?

Adora shout a little squeal of happiness as she felt herself hoisted up again, and Catra nearly slipped in the process of reaching for the laces. She wasn't gentle as she tied her up, holding her under her body as if there was, in a strange fantasy and as far away from reality as possible, the slightest chance of her running away, as if there was anywhere in the known universe she'd rather be.

“Oh, princess, you made a big mistake today” - Catra said, and her voice shuddered with the overwhelming lust that ignited every cell in her body – “Because now, I'm going to do whatever I want with you.”

“Yes!” – Adora said, too incoherent to enter in the character, and that didn't spoil anything, if it improved everything – “I'm yours!”

They didn't discuss safe words, they didn't agree on boundaries, and they didn't care. They could get hurt, and they did at times, but pain was an old friend, a welcome companion in this situation. They rolled across the bed and floor, and whispered dirty words to each other. Catra brought her to her knees and drowned in her smile, and plunged into her and out of her, and brought her to orgasm and rode hes own, into her, one after the other, demanding and vast and so full of meaning they made her cry.

Adora was hers, and she belonged to Adora. How could they go wrong in this situation, when they were so close together it was hard to tell where one began and the other ended? When their history merged into shared memories that - Catra thought in a wild moment - could be seen from each other's points of view, how well did they know each other?

Finally, they rested exhausted, side by side, and Catra barely had the strength to reach out and cut the ties that bound her wrists. Adora took off her blindfold, then, fingers trembling, and crawled across the bed to swallow the little space that separated them, tangling her legs with hers and sighing contentedly into her chest. There were claw marks on her back, on her thighs, red and pulsing, and blood was coming from spots where her skin had been beaten. Catra, on the other hand, was covered in bruises, her leg hurt because Adora had thrown her clumsily on the bed and her left ear was ringing insistently, from when her head was crushed between Adora's powerful thighs, in an overwhelming orgasm that was lost, almost like a distant memory, among many others.

Neither of them could remember ever feeling so good.

“I will leave the rebellion.”

“I will leave the horde.”

They both said at the same time, and laughed, lips touching in an lazy kiss. Adora wrote a number of others across her face, and each one was a spark of ember that warmed her heart, made it pulse harder, more alive than ever. Her hands got lost in her hair, and Catra could tug if she wanted to. She could bury her face in the bed, could fuck her so hard an oblivious observer would think she’s raping her, and would only find a gleeful smile in response.

And Adora could do the same to her, Catra realized. In that moment, when their bond enveloped them and pressed them against each other, she couldn't imagine a way to be touched by her that wasn't welcome, even if it left marks afterward. It was wonderful and precious and enviable, and she knew it took a lifetime of constant effort to build that kind of open, honest, safe intimacy.

How silly to think that anything else would be as precious as this. The recognition of millions of Shadow Weavers, all the power in the world, barely came close to scratching that level of satisfaction.

“You don't have to leave the rebellion” - Catra said, after a few seconds to take a breath – “I know you have friends there.”

“I love them, but you are more important”

Damn, she could cry just hearing that.

“But I don't want to separate you from them…”

Contrary to everything they'd just done, the idea of hurting Adora, actually hurting her in the slightest possible way, was revolting and abhorrent. She was safe with Catra, who knew where she was vulnerable, but exposing her to people who didn't know her and could accidentally hurt her? Unthinkable.

Something roared in her stomach, a fierce, protective beast, made of sharp things she'd collected all her life, made of scars and rage and claws and hate, and she wanted to wrap Adora in her body and protect her, warm her and feed her from herself, even if she was devastated in the process.

Catra expected consent, then, even if reluctantly. She would come back, if Adora wanted to, and survive anyone who tried to tear them apart. She would pay for the rest of the life she had left if she asked, and she would be grateful that she could. If she wanted to, she would rip open her own chest with her own claws and rip out her beating heart, she would bleed for rebellion and for the ideals she chose, whether good or bad, and all the moments of pain that would come would be sweet, if she were on her side.

But, of course, only Adora could surprise her, even after all. Only her.

“Aren't you tired of fighting?”

The question seemed almost introspective, and Catra realized that, not just herself, she was speaking to that part of them they shared with each other. A half of both that did not form a separate entity, but the sum of the two.

“Yes, it's been five years” – she laughed then, because that was absurd – “And all the others before.”

“I can almost hear their voices, wondering if I'm going to run away from my problems” – Adora laughed too, so openly, so exposed – “But they're actually aren’t, are they?”

"We've done enough, for both sides," Catra said.

“Truth...”

“Shall we quit, then?”

“Oh, you'll love it, it's exciting” – Adora laughed with pleasure –

“But there are some people I'd like to bring.”

Catra almost assumed it was Glimmer and Bow, but that's what she'd think before, when she'd gotten used to the idea that Adora was someone else, not Adora.

“Do you think they will accept it?”

“Hmm, I don't see why not” - she said, and seemed overjoyed that Catra had understood, that she had looked at her again and seen what was inside – “Our truce ends in... Darla, honey, what time is it?”

“Six forty-seven pm, point thirty-two seconds. The sun has just set in your strip of the planet”

“Well, now I imagine” - Adora smiled, diving into her again and leaving a lot of kisses on her neck – “See you tomorrow?”

“Yes, I'll be there.”

And as the ship easily won reentry, they made love again. Adora thought about going back to BrightMoon, but didn't feel like doing so, Bow and Glimmer would try to convince her otherwise and the princess, now queen, would probably throw her responsibilities in her face, even if she wasn't. They wouldn't understand.

She was tired of being She-Ra, and she had already given so much to the rebellion. Living her life as Adora wasn't an absurd request to make, after so much service.

The night progressed slowly as she dozed and looked at the stars outside. Razz came and went, leaving a raspberry pie in her arms and, contrary to what she'd expected, a bunch of last words that reduced her to tears.

“Mara would be so proud, Adora, dear” - she stroked her under the chin, aged hands trembling but still steady, and eyes vacant and lost but so intense – “Thank you for making her sacrifice count.”

By dawn, she had already eaten most of the present, and she could hear the approach before she actually saw her. Entrapta ran ahead of her and straight for the ship, with a shriek of excitement, and Scorpia, hesitant and suspicious, approached her.

“I don't know what game you're playing, but I'll not let you...”

“Don't be rude” - Catra interrupted her, pushing her with her hip with a smile that could have split her face in half – “That's no way to talk to our Captain.”

“If I'm the Captain, you need impressive names too” - Adora laughed, grabbing Catra's outstretched hand and, in the same movement, pushing her against the ship - I don't think Second in Command serves you well...

“You dummy, have you forgotten who I am?” - Catra nibbled her chin, as Scorpia flushed a never-before-seen shade of red and hurried inside the ship, babbling that she needed to stop Entrapta from dismantling the whole thing, or forget they hadn't boarded yet and leave with the ship.

“Not at all, Commander.”

And if it wasn't clear who was up and who was down, so much the better.

Darla sail moments later, leaving an irisdescent blue streak that would have been visible for miles, but soon disappeared. Maybe the news that they'd been disinherited would reach BrightMoon or the Horde, or maybe not? Maybe Razz could clear something up, or not, it wasn't important. Would the fighting continue, with both sides weakened, and without the Horde commander and She-ra, general of the rebellion, could either end sooner or later than the stalemate between their leaders?

No one could tell, but Adora and Catra didn't much care. With Entrapta running with laughter around the ship and Scorpia trying to convince her not to dismantle it while they were surrounded by the vacuum of space, Adora walked over to the chair in the command room and sat down, stifling a sigh. Catra jumped into her lap, smirking, and wiggled her brows suggestively.

“Where are we going, Captain?”

“I don't know, Commander, what do you think?”

At the same time, they turned to Darla then, and her voices mingled in unison.

“Darla, surprise us.”

“Oh, and next time” - Catra said, suppressing a satisfied chuckle and getting closer, while the distant stars drew fast strokes, beyond the visor – “You're going to tie me up.”

“Can’t wait.”

End Notes

Thanks for reading, hope that you liked.
I love comments, so feel free to tell me what you guys think
^ ^

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!