Two Seconds to Mayhem

by YanaSapphic

Summary

Catra and Glimmer chase down a lead to find out who put a hit on the BFS. Things get messy fast.

Cyberpunk AU She-Ra with Psion Glimmer and Fixer/Hacker Catra

Notes

I've been thinking about Cyberpunk She-Ra for so long. I've developed all their characters (for the BFS) and have a separate story for the full team as well. For now though, let's focus on these two baddasses!

Cosmos inspired me with a mission and it seemed a perfect fit for these two chaos sapphics. Thanks friend!

For reference, this is how I imagine Catra dressing
Glimmer looks pretty close to how she appeared in the Roll With It episode, but with more of a tech and neon flare (if that makes sense).

“Ready?” Catra whispers, just short of the office door, glancing halfway behind her to see her partner's reaction.

She hears a familiar soft click and whir from behind her. Glimmer already has her eyes closed as one of the three amps implanted in a row along the side of her head comes to life. A light static fills the space around her, her pink hair and vibrant neon jacket rising and flowing along with the growing energy. Catra feels more than sees Glimmer nod her head.

The two of them have scaled all forty two exhausting floors of the Krytis Tower to reach this point. There had been no need for violence on their ascent: Glimmer’s atrociously bright outfit - Neon Mag Prep as she called it - actually doing them a favor amongst the rich corporate Krytis Tower crowd. No one had questioned them as they entered and made their way up.

It had taken them six months, Catra losing her right arm, and more dead bodies than answers to find a lead on the person who had a hit put out on their team, the BFS. And that lead is just on the other side of this door…

At Glimmer’s nod, Catra rolls up the sleeve of her dress shirt a little higher, exposing the realskin zipper on her forearm. She had the concealed pocket installed when she’d gone in for her replacement arm. Reaching inside, she pulls a spool of electrical wire out and begins rigging the door. A moment later she completes their explosive entrance with a high voltage charge emitter at the center of the door.

They step back, Catra pulls a detonator from her vest, and hammers home the button. A shower of radiation and electricity zaps outward, frying any security measures and then the door is blasted off its hinges, sailing into the office in a shower of sparks and plastisteel.

Less than a moment later, the two of them are through the door and into the corporate office.

Adrenaline surges through Catra’s system, triggering the speed chip hooked up to her nervous system, flooding her body with a wave of extra endorphins, and slowing time enough for Catra to assess the room at a glance:

The furniture layout - two realwood desks tucked into the corners - the windows - floor to ceiling tinted plastiglass - and the occupants - two startled corporate lackeys and six less than startled solos in full combat gear.

It's less resistance than they had expected which isn't reassuring in the slightest.

Catra levels her heavy pistol at one of the two bodyguards on the right and manages to squeeze a shot off before the chaos starts. The solo collapses to the ground as the bullet hits their neck - the idiot didn’t even bother wearing anything to protect their head.

Then, the bullets start to fly just as Catra dives behind the first desk.

Catra would be concerned about her partner and her safety given the hail of bullets that tears through the doorway if her partner was anyone but Glimmer. Even with her neuralware, all her planning, and all her training, Catra will never match Glimmer’s speed. Thankfully, neither can the bodyguards that she lays into.

As a psion, Glimmer's command over the telekinetic is unmatched as far as Catra has ever seen. No other psion could use three psionic amplifiers at once without turning their brain into soup, but the sparkly bitch made a habit of it nearly every other fucking day.

Today isn't one of those days where she has to test her limits, thankfully. Catra barely hears the second amp activate amidst the chaos as Glimmer’s form turns into a pink blur, dodging past bullets faster than the bodyguards can react.

A body goes flying over the desk Catra is using as cover. As it crumples against the wall, Catra registers that this is one of the solos. There’s nothing to stand out about their outfit or combat gear, no insignia or special tech to mark them as part of a corporate hit squad. Considering how tight their security has been up to this point, it’s moderately concerning.

As the solo grumbles and starts to come to, Catra buries another two rounds in their chest to make sure they’re down for good. She’d rather add to her body count than lost limb count any day of the week. That’s a mistake she’s not making again.

Catra peaks over her cover and sees Glimmer finishing off the last of the armed resistance. She has the remaining corpo pinned to the wall with nothing but her mind while she tears into the last solo with her heavy submachine gun.

The dust settles with one last thud as the solo’s body hits the floor. The corporate lackey Glimmer has plastered to the wall barely tries struggling to get free before going limp in her telekinetic grasp. When Catra gets up from behind the desk, she sees her girlfriend smirking.

"Four." Glimmer says with a wink once she has Catra’s attention.

She pushes the hair out of her eyes - wet with sweat and probably blood - to show off her undercut where the amps are embedded into her skull - none of them are whirring in the slightest as she holds their prisoner up without exerting a drop of effort.

“Two.” Catra rolls her eyes - there's no contest, there’s never been, but Glimmer always makes a point of showing off her victory. Catra has never pretended to be the best in a firefight - her best work came after the bullets stopped flying. Still, she never complains that much about seeing her girlfriend gloat .

Holstering her weapon, Catra approaches the man - he’s suspended about halfway up the window, his feet dangling well off the ground. His security card dangles from his neck, the only thing about him not currently restrained.

"Ease off his throat, will you?" Catra says, crossing her arms. It's all for show - the two of them have done the "bad merc, worse merc" routine about a dozen times, with varying amounts of success.

"Fine," Glimmer huffs.

The corpo coughs up blood as he manages to take a ragged breath for the first time in twenty seconds. Halfway through the coughing fit, he starts babbling nonsense before Catra raises her hand and he goes quiet in an instant.

"If you don't want my psion friend to toss you out the window," Catra says, hooking a thumb over her shoulder. "You're gunna answer my questions."

"S-Sure… whatever you want just don't-"

"Who the fuck is Shadow Weaver and where can I find her?" Catra cuts him off with an annoyed step forward that's less for show than she would like.

The man's eyes go wide and the babbling returns - only stopped by a low growl from Glimmer and a little more pressure on his chest.

"P-Please, no I… she'll kill me if I say anything."

Catra grits her teeth - this is the same story they got the last two times they ransacked a middle-manager's office. Not this time…

"Fuck it, we're skipping the bit," Catra growls. "Spin him around and get him on his knees."

Glimmer growls in agreement as she flicks her wrist and the corpo is pushed face first into the window and crumples part way to the ground, barely conscious.

This time they brought an extra piece of tech with them for this exact scenario.

Catra plugs a netrunning barrier - one she 'borrowed' from a contact back in the Fright Zone - into the slot at the back of her neck. The artificial reality film over her eyeballs washes over with a suite of startup information as the hacking device comes online. She fishes a neural cord from one of her vest pockets and connects one end to the barrier and the other to a socket at the back of the man's head.

A branching network of nodes unfurls in Catra's AR feed at lightning speed. There's not enough tech hardware inside this asshole's head for a full brain dive - most mid rank corpos don't get access to full cyberbrains - but it's enough for Catra to find what she's looking for.

An address and a password.

That's all she gets before a firm hand on her shoulder brings her out of the dive.

"Babe," Glimmer warns, pointing out the window with her free hand. "We need to go."

Catra follows her line of sight, blinking away some of her AR feed, and sees a hovership in the distance flying directly for Krytis Tower.

"Fuck, I must have tripped something in the dive." Catra grumbles as she disconnects the device.

Glimmer nods once, but starts making for the exit. She's right, they can figure it out later. Catra dashes after her.

The two of them burst out of the room and down the stairs the way they came. They're long gone by the time the security team arrives.
