Adora Light Bringer

by Lesbianmobile

Summary

Adora has become She ra and she loathes it. There is not lustre to the mantle now that she has used She ra to kill Hordak. In his place she has taken lead of the horde, hoping to subdue their rage.

She had stood in that clearing. Adora felt bitterly alone. A sliver of her soul, pulled her to that sword. Embraced it as an old friend.

The freezing took over, the light and rain and silence of the forest. Adora fingers—calloused from years of training—closed around the hilt. It was cold, peeling skin from her fingers. Though it hurt, though it blistered her fingers, some sick part of her felt right.

Then, the gold was flame in her hand.

Then she was She ra, light bled from her, wrapping the forest in blinding embrace.

She held the sword aloft, it was everything. It was everything terrible and cruel, every child's laugh and twinkle of sunlight. It became grievously heavy in her arms, falling forward.

Her hair tangled along the wings of her crown, her pathetic cape danced at her neck. She shut her eyes, knowing, fearing what was to come. Her sword found resistance and then, it halted with a sickening crunch.

She opened her eyes, she had to. She had to look at the carnage. No longer was the world washed in shimmering swaths of sunlight. The world was grey and deadly. The sky was blotted out with storm clouds, prepared to dump rain on her, and wash her tears away.

Hordak was crumpled beneath her, his body was taut and limp in all the wrong places. His skin had gone near translucent. She ra's sword—her sword—skewered him, right down the middle.

His head was tilted backwards, half of his neck bisected, the rest painfully held together with tearing tendons and skin.

His eyes were open staring at the starless night and yet—a bitter tear rolled down her face—they saw nothing.

Adora pressed a hand to her face, falling to her knees. She pulled her sword away, there was more of that sicken crunch.

Hordak fell to the ground, he was discarded along with the death he had wrought.

Then the rain started.

Adora awoke, sweat slicked down her spine. That cursed blood stained sword was nowhere in sight. Just her dagger, just—Catra.

Catra stretched a leg behind her, numbly rubbing her eyes. Her mane was flattened to the side of her head. She shook her head, attempting to fluff out her hair.

The feline attempted to curl up once again at the foot of Adora's bed. She pretended to sleep for a while. Catra cracked a singular eye open. "Why are you awake?" Her pupil turned to a slit, a deadly pinprick.

"It's no—"

"You talk in your sleep. Don't even try lying to me." Her tail whipped across the sheets, wrapping around her ankles.

"Catra." She laughed, shoving the blankets away. She needed water, or tea. She needed to think on the stupid dream.

Catra stood as she did, picking at her claws. "You are such a lousy liar, you know that?" Her tail whipped around Adora's waist, "I'll have to teach you the art of deceit."

"Why would I need that, there's no one to deceive."

"Adoora," Catra groaned, "Tell me the fucking dream."

"Catra, fine—it's the same one. It's the same shitty dream—please—I don't want to talk about it."

Cat's ears flatten her head, only for a split second through. She plastered that smile back on her face, “You could have started with that.”

Adore screeched. She was dreadfully angry now, simmering with rage. It was better than the fear though, better than the sweat and chills.

“It’s almost appropriate to be awake, let’s go steal some breakfast.” Catra’s eyes glinted, she made to leave the room, toting Adora behind her. She didn’t allow Etheria’s saviour one moment of reprieve.

Adora dressed herself. She always did. She knew Catra waited behind the door, listening for—Adora didn’t really know. Perhaps she listened for tears, or mudderings. It was pointless, and silly. She knew as well as most Adore would rather be buried alive then burst into tears.

She smoothed her hair back, adjusting the little poof. She patted powders across her eyes and cheeks covering her skin in a golden sheen. She placed a little diadem along her brow, pressing the blood red jewel to her skin.

It shone easily, mimicking the way a cat’s eye looked for the side.

It clenched her fists, taking in a couple breaths. There was no room in her heart for cowardice. She stood straight, sweeping away from the vanity. Her dress dragged behind her, a gauzy mix of red and black. It had been made for her after Hordak’s death.

It reminded her far too much of Shadow Weaver.

“You look—“ Catra started the sentence before the door had even fully opened. As she laid her mismatched eyes on adore she fell silent. Her silence was only momentary though, “That dress is hideous,” She laughed, “You look, uggh, you look like Shadow

Weaver! Are you going to start wearing masks, cackle occasionally?”

“I get it, I’ll change.” For a second Catra looked relieved. It made Adora’s heart flutter. She would like to keep that expression a while longer, keep the genuine Catra tucked away in her heart.

It passed though, far too quickly. She let a coy smile flood her face.

“Light Bringer.” A soldier rounded the corner. It still made Adora’s blood go cold. She had grown up in the fright zone and yet—and yet the Horde soldier rounding the corner, bowing their helmet threatened to send her running.

“Pfft Light Bringer.”

“Hush.” Adora hadn’t liked the name much either, but with Hordaks demise, it brought Shadow Weaver trying her gnarled hands at being queen of the Horde. Another death had come at Adora’s hands. Light Bringer had stuck after that.

“We found a Bright Moon scout on our borders, they were apprehended—“

Adore set her jaw, “I want to speak with them. Bring them to the throne room, you will not harm them.” She was considered with her instructions. She’d learned the hard way any room for interpretation led to mistakes.

The soldier bowed, the green visor briefly catching the light in just the way to reveal the soldier's eyes; determination, fear, respect. Those were all things she knew too well.

They ran off, his march strangely lopsided. She watched him flee into the Fright Zone, likely about to torment some poor Bright Moon citizen.

“Who do you think it will be?” Catra started running to the throne room. Adora hikes up her skirts, running after her.

“Who are you placing your bet on?”

“Good question.” Catra grabbed a door frame, using it to change her direction, propelling herself down another endless grey hall. “My bet’s on the annoying heir.”

“Glimmer?”

“Ya the one with glitter farts.” Catra’s laugh rang down the hall.

I shifted my knee ever so slightly sending the Shadow weaver dress draped over my knee into a shimming darkness.

Catra pressed against my shoulder. Her poof of hair tickled my neck and her tail flicked against the side of the throne. It was hard to ignore She ra’s sword leaned against the chair, an imposing threat of the power I held. A reminder of the lives I took.

Catra's head bent sideways her headpiece grazing the top of my head. I licked my lips tongue coming away tasting of wax. I hope I didn’t screw up my lipstick. I could hardly decide if I was ready for the door to open. I knew I wasn;t as the jigsaw-like doors crashed open.

Soldiers wrapped gloved hands around smooth brown skin. Glimmer shrieked. She kicked her legs and soldiers at her sides remained completely motionless as she wiggled. Her pink hair flew around her head catching in the red light of the room. Catra cocked a grin. She eye’s glimmer, causing the poor princess to pale// The green visors of the guard became red the closer they got to the light.

“Leave,” I whispered. It took a moment. Then they scrambled backwards not waiting to be told twice.

Glimmer furious whipped her head at the retreating guards, “Cowards.” She yelled a slight giggle taking over her voice. “Adora, I--”

I pursed my lips, Catra leapt from her spot on the arm of the throne and slunk over to Glimmer. A flick of the tail and a black clawed hand that caressed Glimmers face. “First, I win. You better cough up what you owe me, I called the glitter brat. Second,” Catra head up her fingers, making her claws shine, “Princess here isn’t dumb enough to get caught by thoose two.” Glimmer tugged away from Catra.

The green glow of her hand cuffs turned her outfit a terrible grey.

She stumbled a little. Glimmer looked down right murderous.

Catra chuckled. Then she lashed forward, grabbing Glimemrs cuffs. She pulled her forward sending her skittering across the floor. Catra laughed.

“Catra.” I hissed.

She didn’t look the least bit remorseful, still she listened, just like everyone else. She padded back to the throne and plopped herself beside me. Her legs draped over mine as I sat utterly resolute staring at Glimmer.

“Why are you here?” My voice boomed across the room. It tangled with the red glow and shook Glimmer. She flinched a little.

Catra snickered again.

A smile grew across a Glimmer's face, she slid a sparkly purple hip to the side and plastered a cocky grin on her face, “I was captured.”

“Glimmer,” I scolded her like her mother used to from her throne of ivory clouds. Everything then had been so pink. “You can teleport, even if you couldn’t those two can hardly find a wall.”

“Adora,” Glimmers face quickly shifted, she knew her pathetic ruse was up, “Adora when you killed Hordak.”

Catra tensed up, I downright refused to talk about that. We pretended there wasn't a red stain coating my blade. “Stop.” My voice boomed once again.

“Adora no, we were on the same side, you were She ra.”

Catra’s tail continued flicking back and forth, “Idiot, she still is She ra.”

“No, She ra fighting for good.” GLimmer trembled a little.

“Adora does fight for good,” Catra lept from my lap the claws on her toe grating against the stone of the floor. Her tight pants reflected the red light and made her seem to glow. “You my dear princess--”

“Enough,” I pressed a hand to my forehead feeling the spiky black diadem placed on my brow. “Catra, shut up or leave.”

I am not She ra, I can’t be. She ra never killed.

Catra’s pursed lips fell into an easy smile. She sat along the steps leading out to my thone. She was still close enough to claw glimmering eyes out. Glimmer winced. She tugged away ever so slightly.

“Why are you here?” I asked once again.

Glimer looked up at me with a defiant spark, “Why are you here?”

I flinched at that. The black crown on my head went askew, My eyes filled with visions. Blood dripped across my hand coating my skirt. I glance at my sword. I already knew the stone would be red pouring blood across the steel. I shuddered and felt a hand brush across my chin. “You okay?” Catra whispered.

I pushed her aside. Catra hurt for a second staring at me with those eyes. Then she receded back to her step near Glimmer. She sent a look back at me concern lacing her fuzzy cheeks.

“You killed Hordak and Shadow Weaver,” Glimmer screeched. “You fought for the Princesses—for good.”

“You were unprepared,” I seethed. “I killed him but someone was bound to replace him.”

“It didn’t have to be you!” The cuffs were off Glimmers hands and a sparking pink ball aimed just beside my head. I remained seated.

“I wasn’t me, it was that witch. I stopped her glimmer, can you even imagine what devastation she could have wrought? ” I raised a slender brow, “Glimmer the princesses were weak before you took the lead, you didn’t even have a proper prison.”

Glimmer scoffed, “We don’t need one.”

“Really, an entire generation trained in the ideals of Hordak. Were you planning to give them a cake and hope it worked out?”

“Yes.” Glimmer whispered.

“It won’t, we are working to adjust people! Keep them from destroying the world with their fear.”

“You still send them out on patrols!”

“Do you know anything?” Catra asked. I didn’t even attempt to silence her. “We sit here in a defensive position. When Adora first took one hundred and twenty three old recruits left, six of them were old force captains. They have systematically been attacking the fort. On top of it, raids from your precious cities have been trying to wipe us out; we are only trying to protect ourselves.” The kitten's claws were fully out.
All bitterly true, Catra’s words rang across the room. “Catra,” I whispered, “I want to talk to Glimmer alone.”

Catra looked up at me, brow precariously arched. Her head piece glinted in the red light. Her tail flickered almost in a question mark. Then she stood and left. Glimmer just watched. That defiant spark in her eyes had faded. She was a limp shoulder hung almost in defeat.

As the door slid shut behind Catra, “How’s Bow?”

Glimmer looked up at me, “He’s fine, His parents moved to Bright Moon after Hordak was killed, they have been helping rebuild.”

“The other princesses?”

Glimmer met my eyes, there was a gleam of her former self. The one that had loved gossip and white lies, “I haven’t seen Mermista and Sea Hawk, rumour is they got married.” She placed a hand on her chin, in thought, “Entrapta’s missing, just disappeared after Hordak died. The citizens of her kingdom had to come together and elect a council, it’s really interesting to watch them dabble in democracy. Perfuma is rebuilding, her and Bow have been seeing each other.” She slumped forward a little.

“What about Frosta?” I sat forward in my chair eager for information,

“Frosta’s fine, she's exactly the same as before, so are Spinnerella and Netossa.”

I breathed a little sigh of relief, at least they were okay. I stood, ripples falling down the dark sheen of my dress. Glimmer disappeared for a moment then she was beside me.

Sparkles wafted through the air, falling across her lashes. Dusting the dull floor.

“Adora, come back—please I miss you.” She wrapped her arms around me, her single earring tinkled against my cheek. “I miss being your friend.”

“I can’t.” I sighed, “Glimmer, that is regiment after regiment of soldiers residing in this keep. They know nothing but hate. You can not subdue them all, you can not pacify their hate. I have to stay.” I shut my eyes, let he pull away, “I’m still your friend.”

Glimmer sniffled, “I’ll send help for the defectant troops, I--I will put a stop to the raids.” She was crying, I hadn’t even noticed the tears. She flicked them away, bearing a grin in their place.

“Thank you.” I whispered then she was gone, nothing was left but that slight sweet scent of her hair and a few sparkles gracefully falling to the floor.
