It's Not Your Fault

by AuthorWithoutaName

Summary

After a battle against Catra, Adora stands alone in Darla's bridge and reflects. After spending years together, training under Mara, Catra left, joining the Sith. Adora feels a little responsible.

(Star Wars AU that I may or may not expand upon)

Notes

This is just a short snippet of a Star Wars AU that I've been thinking about. I may or may not continue it. I am going to go ahead and mark as a series though in case I do continue it. If ya'll like it though, subscribe or bookmark the series.

I have some other She-Ra fics that I'm writing as well. I have a Spider-Man AU that I am working on, an AU where Adora was raised in Bright Moon and Catra in the Horde (that one is set to be a longfic, so fair warning), and a soccer AU that I am working on, so feel free to check those out as well!

See the end of the work for more notes

It was quiet. The stars twinkled in the distance. The lights had been turned down. Everyone should be asleep. She should be asleep. She wasn't though. She was probably the only one still awake on Darla.

Adora stood in the bridge alone. The captain's chair was behind her. Her legs were sore from the day's events. She probably should at least sit down if she isn't going to sleep. She just can't bring herself to. She could barely keep herself from pacing around the room.

She needed to think. Exercise usually helped with that. She needed a moment, or maybe several to reflect.

She really should sleep. She needed sleep. Her body was tired. It was also sore. Bruised. Scratched. Bow had bandaged her up. Never saying a word, though she knew he wanted to. She knew he wanted to check on. Ask her if she was okay…

Out of instinct, she clenched her left hand. She glanced down at it. It wasn't hers. Not anymore at least. The black glove Glimmer found covered it and she was grateful for that. She wasn't sure if she wanted to look at it. It was a reminder now. An unpleasant reminder of her failures. Of a friendship now lost.

She still wasn't sure if Catra had even meant to do it. She seemed so blinded by everything. Loss. Sadness. Anger.

When they first set out on this path, Mara had warned them both about the dangers of emotions. A Jedi had to keep them in check. A Jedi couldn't let their emotions rule their lives. A Jedi couldn't have attachments…

Truthfully, Adora didn't agree with it but she never voiced that to her Master. She mentioned it to Catra though. Maybe she was responsible for Catra's downfall then.

Maybe if she had done as Mara had told them and pushed away all her feelings, she could've prevented all(italic) of this. Maybe if she had just kept her mouth shut, Catra wouldn't have left. Maybe her and Catra wouldn't be on opposing sides of an almost twenty-four-year-old war.

Maybe.

It had to be her fault, right? She pushed Catra away. She pushed Catra towards the dark side, right? If she had just been a little stronger… or maybe a little wiser… maybe then—

"Adora?"

She almost jumped. Her right hand immediately reached the lightsaber by her hip… or at least the one that should have been there… She lost it as well, about a few moments after she realized she had lost Catra... for good.

"Sorry!"

Bow. Adora glanced at him, he was standing beside the captain's chair, staring at her with concern. He looked hesitant, like he wanted to reach out and help but unsure how. She didn't blame him for that. She wasn't sure what would help either.

Other than a way to go back in time and fix my mistakes, she thought gloomily.

She had so many mistakes. Each one probably a factor in why Catra was gone now. Why the war wasn't ending just yet…

Still, she needed to say something to Bow. It would probably help him get back to sleep if he at least thought he helped her. She could do that for him.

"It's fine," she said dismissively, waving her good hand to try and emphasize her point.

He didn't look convinced, but he didn't say anything. Instead, he stepped forward and came to stand beside her. The frown on his face never disappeared. He glanced away from her though and looked out the cockpit, at the endless void of space before them.

Adora's gaze returned there as well. Though, her mind had been too preoccupied by everything else to really enjoy the beauty of the stars.

"You know…" Bow began, avoiding eye-contact with her. She could still spot him trying to watch her out of the corner of his eyes though.

"None of this… it's not your fault."

Adora shifted her gaze further away. Not your fault. Sure. It was easy to say that. Bow had no idea of everything that happened today. Or of every event that lead up to this. How could he? If he knew everything then he wouldn't be so quick to say that.

She heard Bow sigh beside her. She could feel his concerned gaze on her.

"Please look at me, Adora," he asked, his voice soft.

She knew that she looked at him though, it would be harder to keep everything at bay. A Jedi can't show emotion. A Jedi shouldn't show emotion. Yet, here she was. Tears at the edge of her vision. Her throat now felt tight. Her heart heavy, like it could burst. She was having a little trouble controlling her breathing now.

She needed to calm herself. She was Adora the Jedi knight. The last Jedi knight. At least as far as they knew. Mara had survived for years. A Jedi hidden away in Etheria… Surely there were more Jedi like Mara. Surely more had survived that purge. Surely… She took a deep breath. Exhale. Just like Mara taught her.

"I'm fine."

It was barely above a whisper. Her voice sounded so rough and tired… It surprised even her. She didn't have to glance at Bow to know he was still frowning. To know that he was still watching her, no doubt the concern in his eyes still. He sighed again. He reached out, a hand just hovering over her shoulder. He hesitated though and after a moment, brought it back to his side.

"Whenever you're ready," he offered, his voice still too soft and still too gentle, "we're here for you. Okay?"

Adora didn't face him. She kept her gaze focused on the stars outside. She nodded though. Not daring to speak because she was certain that talking would be the last straw. Talking would be what finally made the dam break.

Bow stepped away and quietly walked out of the room. It was just her again. She could deal with that though. She had to. Emotions. Attachments(italic). All of that had cost her.

As much as it would hurt, she needed to stop Catra. And she needed to stop Catra on her own, she decided. She couldn't let anyone else get hurt. Not for mistakes she made. She wouldn't let anyone else get hurt.

End Notes

Hopefully ya'll enjoyed this! Like I said, I may or may not expand upon this idea later. I want to finish some of my other projects first though (namely the Spider-Man AU).

Thank you for read!

Any kudos or comments are greatly appreciated! They help to keep me motivated and they let me know if anyone actually enjoys the story or not.
