Our Revolution Had Begun

Summary

Backstory: After season 5, the galaxy, after being freed from Horde Prime's oppressive rule, promptly falls to fighting itself again. Catra doesn't take part in the initial war, but when the war comes to Etheria from the horrible Freikorps Empire, Catra joins the war effort and ends up getting horrifically traumatized because most everyone she knows during the war dies. She becomes very different, even physically unrecognizable to her friends after going back to Bright Moon on leave. After going back to the fighting, she is later captured and held personally by Freikorps leader Gorge Bormann, who she kills a bit later, escaping from him. She reunites with her friends.

And then she realizes they're losing the war. Why? Because the monarchy refuses to make the tough decisions. A year goes by, and Catra decides that to save hundreds of thousands, millions, even, she must overthrow the monarchy.

Our revolution had begun. Our fight for not just Etheria itself, but its future. As it settled in as to what had happened, many royalists and monarchists simply went away quietly, but some - Some fought. And right now, the monarchists in Bright Moon were fighting hard. I had ordered them to stand down, but they definitely were not standing down now, as our forces clashed with them in the very streets of the city.

Amidst the chaos of the urban battleground, I found myself involved directly in the fight. The air was thick with tension and the acrid scent of gunpowder, mingling with the shouts of soldiers and the deafening roar of artillery. As I dashed from bombed-out street corner to bombed-out street corner, my heart raced like the rhythm of battle drums, and my grip tightened around the cold metal of my submachine gun.

With determined focus, I sprinted forward, my boots pounding against the cobblestone streets. The monarchist troopers were a bright contrast against the backdrop of the city's muted tones – their armor glinting in the pale sunlight as they advanced with relentless resolve. I took aim and squeezed the trigger, a burst of rapid gunfire erupting from my weapon, the muzzle flashes illuminating the chaos around me.

My shots found their mark, striking around the armored troopers and forcing them to take cover behind shattered storefronts and crumbled walls. The exchange of fire echoed through the city, each gunshot punctuated by the distant rumble of explosions. As I dove behind a fallen marble pillar, I felt the rush of adrenaline coursing through my veins, fueling my every movement.

As I crouched behind cover, I adjusted my uniform, the fabric clinging to my sweat-slicked skin. The weight of my weapon served as a constant reminder of the stakes of this battle – the fight for our freedom and the future of Etheria. I cursed as I realized I only had one magazine left for my gun.

The city around me bore the scars of the conflict – shattered windows, crumbling facades, and streets littered with debris. It was a constant reminder of the cost we were willing to pay for liberation, and for victory. With every shot fired and every step taken, I was reminded of the urgency of our mission – to overthrow the inefficient and naive monarchy that had held Etheria in its grasp for far too long, and once they were gone, defeat the Freikorps.

As the battle raged on, I steeled myself for what lay ahead. The sounds of artillery and gunfire were the symphony of our struggle, a symphony that we, the rebels, were determined to orchestrate to our victory. With a deep breath, I braced myself and prepared to rejoin the fight, knowing that our efforts here would shape the destiny of Etheria for generations to come.

I watched as another squad of rebel troops engaged the monarchist soldiers with fierce determination. The rhythmic thuds of their boots echoed in harmony with the distant rumble of a - oh, that was a tank! One of ours! I let out a whoop at the rumble of the tank's treads as it advanced, providing crucial support to our forces. As it rolled forwards, its cannon roared to life, explosive rounds finding their targets and sending shockwaves through the enemy ranks.

I reached for my radio, fingers trembling slightly, and brought it to my lips. "Adora, how's the palace?" I inquired urgently, my voice cutting through the chaos around me.

Static crackled over the radio, followed by Adora's breathless response. "Catra... right now, I'm helping capture Glimmer," she managed between labored breaths, her words punctuated by the sounds of exertion. “Micah’s already down.”

A surge of pride and reassurance swept over me. Adora was in the thick of the battle, ensuring that our mission to dismantle the monarchy from within was progressing as planned. "Good work," I replied, my voice firm and resolute. It was a brief exchange, but in that moment, our connection was tantamount, a reminder that we were united in purpose despite the chaos surrounding us.

I shut off the radio and turned my attention back to the ongoing combat. My troops fought valiantly, their resolve unwavering as they engaged the enemy forces. I leaped into action, rallying our fighters and coordinating our movements with tactical precision. As the battle raged on, I could feel the weight of our cause pressing upon my shoulders – the liberation of Etheria, the end of monarchy, and the dawn of a new era.

With my submachine gun held tightly in my grasp, I charged forward alongside my fellow rebels, each step bringing us closer to our goal. The palace may have been the heart of the monarchy's power, but the streets of Bright Moon were the battleground for our revolution.

We pressed forward through the chaos of battle, unwavering as we advanced towards the heart of the monarchist command camp. The sounds of conflict surrounded us, punctuated by the clatter of falling armored bodies, the chatter of gunfire, and the shouts of close combat. I could almost taste victory, gritting my teeth as we moved forwards.

As we breached the enemy's defenses, our squads surged forward, engaging the monarchist soldiers in a fierce melee. The clash of bayonets against armor, the screams of the wounded, and the cacophony of battle resounded in my ears, drowning out all other sounds. The camp was a scene of chaos, as our forces fought to gain control.

In the middle of the tumult, I spotted the command tent, the focal point of the enemy's leadership. I gestured to my fellow rebels, and we stormed the tent, overwhelming the guards and capturing the command staff within. Among them was Bow, once my loyal friend, but who now stood on the opposite side of this conflict.

Bow's anger was palpable as he glared at me, his voice laced with frustration. "Catra, how could you do this? How could you lead a rebellion against us, against your friends?"

I took a long drag from my cigarette, exhaling a plume of smoke before I responded. His words stung, but I knew that my convictions were strong. "Bow, when we win this war, when the monarchy falls, you will understand why I had to do this."

My words hung in the air. I could see the conflict in Bow's eyes, torn between loyalty to the old ways and the growing realization that change, and our victory, was inevitable. As much as I felt the weight of our history and friendship, I knew that the path I had chosen was the right one.

I extinguished my cigarette and met Bow's gaze, my resolve unwavering. "We're fighting for a better future, Bow. For victory against the Freikorps, against the loss of any more lives in a war that will rage on for far too long without my intervention."

The camp was a symbol of the old order, a system that had to be dismantled for the sake of a brighter tomorrow. For the sake of victory. And as the dust settled and the echoes of conflict faded, I knew that our struggle was far from over.
