super vision

by dead_frog

Summary

"Hey Adora," Catra rasps, her voice lower than usual. Adora blushes, "why'd you-" Catra cuts herself off to yawn, "why'd you transform?"

"I just wanted a better look at you," Adora responds. Catra's face pulls into a frown and Adora has a realisation, "oh! I never told you. She-Ra has super vision. I can see things super well when I'm She-Ra," Adora doesn't mean to sound like she's boasting, but it is pretty cool. Catra's face stays frowning though.

Adora thinks She-Ra has super vision, turns out she might be wrong

Catra and Adora are resting. They seem to be doing that a lot recently. There's no threat of the Horde, no galactic space army breathing down their necks. Adora used to find it impossible to sit still. But when Catra's laying across her stomach and purring, how could she not be still? Or at least try to, because Catra is so adorable like this.

She'd be even cuter if she transformed into She-Ra though. She-Ra's super vision is incredible. If only she could share it with Catra, so Catra could see the world She-Ra does.

Now Adora's antsy, hands fidgeting in Catra's fur. She tries to focus on that feeling, but she wants to really see Catra. It's a sight only Adora gets, and she wants to drink that in.

"For the honor of Greyskull," Adora whispers, trying to preserve Catra's peace like she isn't about to turn into a blinding light. Catra's eyes flutter open, right as Adora transforms.

Much better. Adora's hands feel bigger too, more to pet Catra with, but it's really the sight that changes everything, like being able to see the short fur on Catra's face without having to get absurdly close. Sometimes when they're kissing, Adora sneaks her eyes open just to peak.

But when she's She-Ra, she doesn't have to!

"Hey Adora," Catra rasps, her voice lower than usual. Adora blushes, "why'd you-" Catra cuts herself off to yawn, "why'd you transform?"

"I just wanted a better look at you," Adora responds. Catra's face pulls into a frown and Adora has a realisation, "oh! I never told you. She-Ra has super vision. I can see things super well when I'm She-Ra," Adora doesn't mean to sound like she's boasting, but it is pretty cool. Catra's face stays frowning though.

"That's not in any of the stories and myths," Catra says skeptically, shuffling to sit up. She'd been reading them lately, ever since Adora taught her how to read First Ones' writing.

"I swear, Catra! You know how we see the stars as a blur, right? Well, when I'm She-Ra I see them as speckles-"

"Adora," Catra cuts her off, "do you need glasses?"

Adora pauses. Surely not…

"Glasses are for old people," Adora replies, "Razz wears glasses."

"Because your eyes worsen as you get older. Some people are just born with bad eyesight," Catra explains slowly. Adora goes silent again, "everyone sees the stars as speckles," Catra tacks on, and Adora's face drops.

"She-Ra doesn't have super vision?"

"I think you just have bad vision. She-Ra doesn't," Catra says.

"Really?" Adora asks in disbelief. It all makes sense now. Adora almost feels sad when Catra laughs at her.

It's squeaky and unrestrained, and it makes Adora realise that, yeah, it is kinda funny.

"Let's take you to see an optometrist, dummy," Catra says. Adora doesn't even know what an optometrist is, nor how Catra knows either. Catra stands and outstretches her hand, waiting for Adora to take it. It's so similar to the future vision she had in the heart, but no, this is better. Because it's real, and it's never going away.

Adora takes Catra's hand and they walk off.

Adora's glad she doesn't have to wish Catra could see the same things as her, glad she shares the same world as her, glad they have the same vision, that it isn't just She-Ra with this luxury. Because it is so beautiful, and Adora wants everyone to see it and she is going to witness it without She-Ra.

Once she gets a pair of glasses.
