Chapter 1

Frost fell over the fright zone, a bitter breeze lurking in the shadows, the monochrome metal even colder than usual. It was Christmas eve, not like Catra knew that. Nonetheless, she sat alone in her usual place, despite the cold, on top of one of the ‘buildings’, her legs and tail swinging off the edge. It was the place where she first lost Adora. She took another swig from the bottle of whisky she’d stolen from the kitchen. Shadow Weaver would punish her for that later but that was a problem for future Catra. She just sat, sat and stared, stuck in the world of her torturous thoughts. A wave of cold air caused her to put her feet up on the ledge and cradle herself, in hopes of bringing some warmth to her body, along with the odd fuzziness from the alcohol.

Multiple times a week she’d go up there and think about what could have been. Adora. She hated it, the thoughts. It would be so much easier without them. But a part of her was connected to them as they were the only thing keeping her sane; she was truly alone. She tightened her arms around her torso and let the dam break, for the first time in God knows how long. She sat there and sobbed into her arms wishing they weren’t hers until her eyes were too strained to cry. She didn’t leave, simply took her head from her arms, breathed, closed her eyes and listened.

Adora sat in Glimmer's room, helping her choose an outfit for the Christmas ball the next day, waiting for her to come out of her bathroom. A moment later, she came in, twirling around in a frilly, pink dress that wasn’t that different from the thousand others Adora was forced to sit through. “I think this is the one!” Glimmer said, bouncing around the room. “Yeah it’s beautiful, Bow will love it!” Adora replied not caring about the dress, just wanting to get out of there. Glimmer’s cheeks flushed and she turned her head to the ground. “You think so?” Glimmer said quieter than before. “Of course. But Bow would love it no matter what it was.” Adora had barely finished what she was saying before Glimmer suffocated her in a hug. “Okay, Okay,” Adora said through a chuckle. “I’m going to go to my room and find an outfit. You should go talk to Bow, maybe ask him to the ball tomorrow.” she walked away with a smirk and a wink before Glimmer could reply, leaving the room and letting out a sigh once the door was shut.

The smile faded from Adora’s face as she strolled down the hallways, occasionally waving or nodding at a guard, before finally reaching her room. She stepped in and closed the door behind her, collapsing onto her bed, staring up at the ceiling. She was excited of course; it was Christmas but it didn’t feel right, she still felt alone. She knew that it was selfish to be feeling this way because she had so many great friends but still, the thought wouldn’t subside. She didn’t want to admit who she missed but oh did she want to give her the best Christmas ever. Catra.

She sat up in anticipation as an idea hit her, whether good or bad that was a problem for future Adora. There were so many kitchens in the castle, she knew one that even on Christmas eve would be empty. She made her way down there and around an hour later came back to her room to tie a fluffy jumper around her waist, grabbed what she’d made in the kitchens and put a backpack on before setting off.

Catra didn’t know how much time had passed whilst she sat there, she just knew that it was getting colder by the minute and would soon become unbearable, even with her thick coat of fur. She was about to give in and go back to her empty bunk bed when she heard the footsteps of a person. Hers. She passed it off as another of her hallucinations, maybe one of Double Trouble’s tricks. “Haven’t you hurt me enough DT?” no answer. The footsteps got closer and Catra refused to turn around, to be faced with disappointment.

“Catra” It sounded so much like her, it made her angry but yearning to be in her arms. But she couldn’t fall for it again. “DT I’m not in the mood.” She said emotionless, still facing away from the person. “Catra it's me.” She turned around to face the Adora look-alike, nearly giving in. “Yeah definitely. Adora would visit me of all people when the only time we see each other is when we’re in a battle. But yes, Adora has come to randomly visit me on a freezing night, not armed or wanting to kill me,” She said, a scoff thrown from her throat after speaking, her arms now by her sides.
“Catra this isn’t a trick, I know that it’s surprising to see me here but I felt so alone without you and finally snapped.” Catra’s response was a laugh, a pain-stricken laugh. “Okay DT you can stop now, you’ve had your fun.”
“Catra I’m not DT, I’m me and I can prove it. You used to sleep at the end of my bed when we were both still in the Horde and you love being scratched behind your ears. One time when we were younger, we stole a cake and Shadow Weaver didn’t let it go for months but it was so delicious that we both thought it was worth it.”

Catra spoke before the blond could spill anything else; if anyone heard that, she would be terrorised about it “Adora? Why are you here? Just to taunt me?”
“No, I’m here because it’s Christmas eve and I couldn’t bear another one without you”
“Christmas? What the fuck are you going on about? Are you a hallucination? Am I even crazier than I thought I was?”
“Your not crazy Catra. And Christmas is a celebration where people are with your family and give gifts, it’s a thing that they didn’t do in the Horde but I wanted to do it with you so I’m here.”
“Well, I can see why none of us has a family.”
Adora wasn’t sure what to say to that, she wasn’t sure why she was even here, yet not for a second did she think to leave. “I’m sorry, for everything. Every day I regret leaving you and I know this isn’t going to change anything but please, just come with me tonight and then you can go back to being Horde-ruling Catra.

Catra thought for a minute, she was about to say no but what did she have to lose? “Fine, I’ll go with you.”

Adora's face lit up and that smile of proudness that Catra craved but hated shone across her face. She held out her hand and waited. Catra took it. The pair stood there, hands entwined, for a good minute, staring into the eyes of each other, ignoring the cold. Catra coughed "C'mon then dummy, you still need to tell me more about this Christmas shit." Catra said completely forgetting the wall she'd put up and just being her.
"Okay," Adora laughed and took one more look into the mismatched eyes of the feline before dragging her through their secret route out of the freight zone.

After half an hour of leaping between the 'buildings', their hands still together, reached the Whispering Woods. "Ugh, Princess why'd you bring us here?"
"Because there's a place that I've wanted to show you for ages that I think you'll love but I couldn't."
That was bittersweet, this whole situation was bittersweet, Catra wanted to run, give Adora another set of scars but it was so nice to be holding her forever-warm hand again. "It's so weird being back here with you," Adora said, quickly sputtering as she realised that could be taken wrong. "N-not like that, I just mean we've grown so much since we first crashed here." she managed to get out, beginning to sweat.
"It's okay, idiot. I think that it's oddly nice to be back here with you too, us different people.” Adora’s cheeks flushed and she turned her head away from the other bright eyes. “Are you going soft on me Catra?” The blonde teased, slightly pushing her limits. “Never.” She reciprocated the comment with a playful punch on Adora’s arm with the hand that wasn’t bound. ”Anyways Princess, show me this place.”

By the time they reached their destination, the sun had fully gone down and the stars out. They were high up in front of a cottage with flowers and trees all around and a flat roof with a wooden railing going around the side, overlooking Bright Moon and the woods. Adora let go of Catra’s hand and gestured her arms to the cottage with a quiet “Tada”
“Oh, my- Adora this place is beautiful,” Catra said in awe, not addressing the cringey motion that had just happened. “Yeah it really is, I found it when I was exploring one day. I don’t think that anyone else knows about it.” Catra shivered and let out a whimper. The blond responded by interlocking their hands once more and saying “Let’s get you inside, you must be freezing.”

Adora opened the door to the cottage with a key she found underneath the doormat. She stepped inside, untieing the jumper around her waist and attempting to put it on the brunette. “Adora, I might be freezing but I am perfectly capable of putting a jumper on thanks,” Catra said, trying to not sound too pissy as she understood that Adora was only trying to help. “I’m sorry. But put it on it’s cold and I’m immune.”
“Sure Adora sure. I’m sure your muscles warm you up.”
“You might be right there,” Adora flexed her muscles. Catra forgot how to breathe then snapped out of it and put the jumper on. Adora walked in front “This way m’lady,” she said, bowing.
Catra just laughed, she felt the warmth inside that she hadn’t for a long time. The blond lit the fire before walking into the small kitchen and grabbing the stuff for a hot chocolate whilst Catra stood in front of the island, watching her.

“So how have you been, I haven’t properly talked to you in years,” Adora said, not looking up from her careful hot chocolate crafting.
“Uhh. Lonely to put it best, everyone’s gone” Catra muttered, just loud enough to hear, not thinking. “Sorry. I just. I’m not used to this and everything in me is telling me to hurt you and leave, but I’m not going to,” she had no clue why she said that but it was out now. “Catra.” Adora looked up “I’m sorry but I’m here now if that counts for anything.”

“Why now?”
“I guess I’d finally had enough of not having you in my life. Leaving you was one of my biggest regrets.” Her eyes glazed over with tears so she wiped them away and sniffled. Catra didn’t know what to say; she’d never been good at conversations like this and Adora understood that. “The hot chocolates are done!!”

“I’m happy you’re excited Princess but what is a hot chocolate?”
“Oh, Catra. You’ve never had this before. Well, I’m glad to be sharing this magical moment with you. Here,” She said ignoring the baggage that could be unpacked from that. Adora handed her a mug of hot chocolate. Catra stood there for a few seconds with a puzzled look on her face. “You drink it. Like this.” The blond picked up her mug with two hands and took a big gulp of the drink, instantly regretting it. Catra fell into a laughing fit. “Hey! It was really good I’m just stupid. Be careful it’s hot.”
“Yeah, I got that one Princess,” Catra said after she stopped laughing. She then lifted the mug to her lips and took a small sip of the drink, her eyes widening at the taste. “This is amazing,” she took another sip “But would be better if it was a bit more interesting.” She took a bottle from the holder in her leggings and poured a hefty amount in.

“Catra!” Adora playfully scolded her.
“What? Put whiskey in anything and it’s a hundred times better, try it. And besides, I’m sure this is Christmasy?” She poured less into Adora’s as she knew that she was the biggest lightweight in all of Etheria. “Go on, try it.” The blond rolled her eyes and took back her drink before cautiously putting it to her mouth and downing it, in fear of the alcohol burning her throat and her mouth was already burned. After some thinking time and Catra about to make fun of her, she burst out with “That was amazing!”
“I told you, Dork. Throw alcohol in anything and it’s way better.”
“To be fair, most of the time you’re right,” Adora replied, trying to not seem too much of a sap.

"Wow Princess, that was an actual compliment," Catra said, with her signature sarcasm.
"And won't be the first." Adora snapped back, finally shutting the other girl up.

"Now you've warmed up, I want to show you the best part."
The blond held out her hand again leading the brunette to a ladder at the back of the house. She took a blanket from the chair and flung it over her shoulder. She then climbed up the ladder, Catra behind her. At the end of it was the roof and a telescope in front of a bit of railing "C'mon, the stars are really pretty tonight!"
The pair walked toward the telescope and Catra watched Adora set it up. She agreed, they were pretty, Adora and the stars, mostly Adora. "Okay, it should be good to look through now." She took a few steps back.

Catra put an eye up to the lens, her body relaxing in astonishment and her tail swishing from side to side. Now it was Adora's turn to think that the other was pretty, more adorable, cute, precious and every word she could think of to describe her. "Adora? Hey uh-Adora?" Catra waved in front of her face, moving away from the telescope.

Adora stepped back, face now completely red. "Um I-I was uh just uh I don't know what I'm talking about" she put her head in her hands. Catra moved in front, chuckled lovingly and took the blond's hands in hers, rubbing her palms with her thumbs. "It's okay, Adora. Anyways, you're really cold loser come over here."
Catra jumped onto the railing, sitting down and holding her hand out. If it was even possible, Adora's smile grew before she took the brunette's hands, joining her on the rail. It was like their spot back in the freight zone, except it felt different, good different.

Their hands were still together, how they should be. "Oh Catra, I made you a Christmas present!"
"I'm not even going to ask at this point," Catra said, holding in a laugh that she released after she spoke. Adora had to free her hand to get the present out of her backpack. She placed it on her lap and unzipped it, retrieving a white box, putting the backpack on the decking behind them. "It's not a lot, I kinda did it on a whim and I didn't know if I was actually going go or not, not that I didn't want to I just-"

"Adora, stop. Whatever it is I'm going to love it because you made it, I'd love anything you did for me." She slightly regretted saying that, a wave of anxiety crashing over her, that Adora was going to laugh at her and leave her again. "Really?" Tears welled in the blond's eyes, turning to face the other girl. "Of Course" Catra reassured, no wavering in her voice. "Now c'mon, I wanna see what you got me!"
"Okay." She stared into those mismatched eyes a long second longer, then handed over the box.

Catra's tail swished in excitement. She slowly opened the box, Adora edging closer in anticipation (and she wanted to be as close as possible). She opened it and tossed the lid aside, melting in admiration for the person sitting next to her. Inside were 4 sugar cookies two that vaguely resembled Catra and two Adora, they didn't look great; there was icing all over the place, the colours weren't mixed properly but Catra loved them more than anything (apart from Adora of course).

"Do you like them?" Adora twiddled her thumbs, anxious for an answer. "Like them? Adora these are the best things I've ever been given, thank you." She was then entrapped in a long-awaited hug, they were both careful to not knock the box but they hugged as if one was about to die. After a while, they unravelled from the hug, Catra passed her a cookie of her own face before taking one that sort of looked like Adora. They ate all of the cookies, only noises of enjoyment being heard from the effect of the confectionery and maybe trying to shake the anxiety for being each other's presents, so close.

Adora put the box behind them and moved closer. Twelve bells sounded from the Bright Moon clocktower as they were just close enough to hear it. "Merry Christmas, Catra."
"Merry Christmas to you too."
They both leaned in, wanting to do this ever since they could remember. Their lips found each other, both releasing a sigh of happiness that had been unconsciously trapped until then. They melted into the kiss, hands finding hair, faces and hips, both moving closer until they couldn’t anymore. They broke apart for air, foreheads touching, Catra’s purrs filling the silence.

"I love you, Adora I always have." Catra gave her another peck on the nose.
"I love you too, I will forever." She returned the kiss.

They may have changed, gone through terrible, traumatizing things but as of that moment and many more to come, they felt the same for each other as they had for so many years. And the Christmases only got better from here.
