Glimmer's hero

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/38563959.

Rating:
General Audiences

Archive Warning:
No Archive Warnings Apply

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Glimmer (She-Ra)

Characters:
Glimmer (She-Ra), Adora (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Meet-Cute, Romance, Alternate Universe - Modern Setting, Useless Lesbians, First Dates, Mild Hurt/Comfort

Language:
English

Stats:
Published: 2022-04-23 Completed: 2024-08-07 Words: 10,355 Chapters: 5/5

Glimmer's hero

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/38563959.

Rating:
General Audiences

Archive Warning:
No Archive Warnings Apply

Category:
F/F

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationship:
Adora/Glimmer (She-Ra)

Characters:
Glimmer (She-Ra), Adora (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Meet-Cute, Romance, Alternate Universe - Modern Setting, Useless Lesbians, First Dates, Mild Hurt/Comfort

Language:
English

Stats:
Published: 2022-04-23 Completed: 2024-08-07 Words: 10,355
Chapters: 5/5

Glimmer's hero

by Bagge

Summary

Adora has met a girl she likes. She's sparkly and fun and beautiful and Adora hopes that maybe, just maybe this time her... little problem won't become a large problem.

Chapter 1

Chapter Notes

> Some traffic- and water related danger and child endangerment. No one will be hurt.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Oh well. Here goes nothing.

Adora took a deep breath, opened the door, took a purposeful step - and promptly crashed right into a small, pink haired woman who was half-sprinting in the opposite direction. She fell to the floor with an - Adora was ashamed to take notice of this - adorable little 'ooof' surrounded by the content of the bags Adora had dropped in the crash.

"I'm so sorry," Adora gasped, and feebly tried to get out of the way of the door, pick up her things and help the pink haired woman to her feet.

"Why don't you watch where you..." the woman began with angry voice, which trailed off as she took in Adora's appearance, earnest and muscular and worried, her sincere face surrounded by a golden halo from the lamp just behind her lighting up her blonde hair.

"...where you...." the woman stammered, suddenly red in her face.

"I'm... I'm..." Adora whispered, and she couldn't stop staring at the woman on the floor, tiny but with a presence like a queen that would make her stand out in any crowd, hair pink and beautiful and large eyes almost shining from within.

"Um..." she said.

"Um..." the woman on the floor answered.

They stared at each other, bright red in their faces, hearts racing.

Adora broke free from the spell first.

"I'm so sorry!" she gasped. "I... I didn't mean to... here let me..." she quickly sat down next to the still mesmerized woman with a worried frown.

"Did you hit your head?" she asked, suddenly anxious. "You might have a mild concussion. Don't move, I'll..."

And before Glimmer knew it, her head was in the knee of the blonde woman - the strong, beautiful, compassionate woman - and her hands - her warm, strong hands - gently touched her temples and suddenly she leaned forward and her eyes - her beautiful, blue eyes filled her word.

"How do you feel?" Adora asked with a slightly trembling voice, revealing a sensitive soul beneath the strong, competent surface.

"!" Glimmer said.

"Are you feeling dizzy?" Adora said with a worried frown. She leaned closer so Glimmer could feel her warm, kinda sunny breath. "Do you need air?"

"!" Glimmer said.

The pink-haired woman looked absolutely breathtaking. Vulnerable, yet strong. Adora could feel the heat radiating from her, and those large, violet eyes seemed to fill her entire world. There was nothing Adora wanted more than to loose herself in them.

...which might perhaps be less-than-perfectly polite with a woman she never met before.

"Um..." she said and pulled back slightly.

"Um..." Glimmer said, suddenly realizing that she was lying on the library floor in the lap of an unknown woman.

"...are you...?" Adora began.

"I'm fine," Glimmer quickly piped up. She sat up, very sternly telling the part of herself which felt a pang of disappointment to shut up.

"I'm so glad to hear that," Adora said and quickly jumped to her feet and held out her hand - her strong hand - to the woman on the floor.

With a slightly shaky breath Glimmer took the hand. It felt like flying as the strong woman practically lifted her to her feet.

- It hardly felt like the woman on the floor had any weight at all. She rose to her feet practically by levitation, gracious as a dancer -

They stared at each other.

"Um..." Glimmer whispered.

"Um..." Adora said.

They both blushed crimson red.

"I'm so sorry," Adora said when her tongue finally obeyed her, staring at the small hand in hers. "I'm so clumsy. I should have watched where I..."

"Oh no," Glimmer quickly said and finally - reluctantly - let go of Adora's hand. "It was my fault. I shouldn't have ran like that. I..."

"Oh no! are you in a hurry. Am I holding you up?"

"Of course not," Glimmer quickly said, mentally re-categorizing the afternoon's meetings from 'critically important' to 'future Glimmer's problem'. "In fact, I'm not in a rush at all." Seemingly unconsciously, a hand moved to her hair, twirling through the pink locks. "Maybe I... maybe I could buy you a lunch? As thanks? For helping me?"

Adora stared at the fingers moving through the hair, too mesmerized to answer for a moment or two.

"Oh no," she finally said. "I couldn't possibly..."

"Oh, it wouldn't be a bother at all," Glimmer answered with enthusiastic voice. She bent down and started to pick up Adora's belongings. "I would love to..."

Her voice trailed off as she stared at a huge metal object on the floor.

"...is that...?" she asked.

"Wha..." Adora begun, and then to her mortification she realized just what Glimmer was looking at. "Oh no! That's nothing. Just a... prop."

She quickly scooped up the large, shiny sword with golden hilt and pressed it down in the sports bag again, for the thousands time cursing the broken zipper.

"A prop," Glimmer asked with interested voice. "Are you in theatre?"

"Y...yeah?" stammered. "Kinda... not really. I'm... between jobs right now. Um... thanks so much for helping me. I'll just..."

She took a step towards the door, but the smaller woman quickly stepped between her and the door.

"I still owe you a lunch, remember?" she said with an urgent smile. "You don't want to make me a liar do you?"

"Oh no," Adora paled. "I would never..."

"I'm teasing you, silly," Glimmer said with a little laugh that made all sort of interesting things to Adora's limbic system. "But I would love to hear more about what brings a girl like you, with a sword like that to a place like this."

Glimmer mentally kicked herself for the horrible line, but it seemed to do the job as the other woman hesitantly shifted her weight between her feet. She put a friendly hand on her back - her strong, muscular back - and gently steered her in the direction of the library cafeteria.

-the small woman's warm hand against her back felt like being led into the first steps of a dance, like even if the touch was light as a feather, Adora would do anything if even the gentlest of touch from those firm hands demanded it of her-

"...salads are OK but nothing special," Glimmer babbled. "They share bakery with a few other cafés in town and the bread is really really good, but if you really want to treat yourself I suggest the soup." She lowered her voice. "Today's special is artichoke," she said with a conspiratorial wink, as if the sign announcing as much wasn't just beside them. "So, what can I get you?"

"Oh, uh... anything is fine..." Adora said, desperately scanning the menu for the cheapest item without finding anything.

"Soup it is," Glimmer purred. "Soup and a pastrami sandwich. A big strong girl like you need her proteins." She gently touched Adora's biceps, causing her to blush like a stop light. Suddenly a worried frown passed over Glimmer's face (immediately causing Adora to internally swear to do whatever in her power to make the worried-looking-woman to look not-worried). "You are not vegetarian, are you? They have brie and edamer and... oh, and if you are vegan..."

"A-anything is OK," Adora quickly said. "I love pastrami. Really."

"You do?" Glimmer lit up (causing a little achievement ding sound in Adora's brain). "That's great. So do I. See, we already get to know each other."

She held out her hand - her soft, warm, surprisingly strong hand with it's expertly manicured nails sparkling in pink and violet and smiled at Adora.

"I'm Glimmer."

"I'm.. I'm Adora!" Adora squeaked and took Glimmer's hand like it was a baby bird she had to hold and protect against all the ills of the world.

They looked at each other with large eyes, holding the other's hand for ten full seconds before they simultaneously realized what they were doing and let go with a mutual blush.

"Glimmer..." Adora repeated, voice full of wonder.

"Glad you like it," Glimmer teased. "Your name is pretty 'adorable' too... oh no, that was terrible. Sorry."

"You.. you don't need to apologize," Adora quickly said. "It's cute."

"Think I'm cute, do you?" Glimmer teased.

"!" Adora squeaked, which caused Glimmer to laugh that little brain-hacking laughter again.

"I'm still only teasing you," she said.

She leaned closer.

"I like to tease you."

"!"

"Did the two of you want to order, or..." the amused waitress asked, causing both Glimmer and Adora to jump.

"Of course," Glimmer quickly said and took two steps to the counter. She turned and gave Adora a radiant smile. "Why don't you pick us a table in the meanwhile. Her smile grew wider. "Surprise me."

Adora nodded silently, and with beating heart she stumbled further into the old living-resident-turned café with its many nooks and crannies. She found a table with two chairs by itself without much view from the other rooms in case they wanted privacy in case they wanted to... in case they would...

She blushed furiously.

"You just met her," she told herself very sternly. "She's just friendly. Don't read too much into it."

She plopped down on the slightly-less-comfortable-looking chair and stared at the doorway where Glimmer was bound to appear at any moment.

Her mouth felt dry.

Things like this didn't happen, right?

Women like that did not just fall into the laps of women like her, right?

Despite herself, Adora felt a glimmer (!) of hope. Maybe, maybe this time things would work out.

Maybe this time, she wouldn't destroy everything.

On the street outside, the background sound of the city was disrupted by the sound of sirens. A fire-truck went by. And another one. A third was clearly rushing closer.

Adora tensed.

She didn't have to get involved.

It might even be a false alarm.

She glanced at the sports bag, then at the door opening where Glimmer still had to emerge.

A voice outside called for help.

With a frustrated snarl Adora stood up and tore the sports bag open.

- - -

It was later, much later.

Adora despondently trudged towards the motel, carrying her now wet bags.

It hadn't been a false alarm, so that was something, she supposed.

Hurray!

Her stomach growled, and she realized she hadn't eaten anything. Her thoughts unbidden went to Glimmer and her pastrami sandwiches.

Or just to Glimmer, really.

Adora had liked her. Really, really liked her. There had been chemistry, there had been banter, and she smelled really nice.

Adora blushed.

Also - but she readily admitted she was no expert in these matters - she thought she had detected some slight hints of... interest from Glimmer.

Dare she think... flirting?

Probably just her imagination playing tricks on her.

It was a moot point now anyway.

Glimmer had bought her lunch, and Adora had ran away like a coward.

Surely Glimmer hated her now.

Adora hoped she did. It felt like someone should.

Sometimes it really sucked, being a hero.

- - -

"I met a wonderful girl and she stood me up and I will never see her again and I will die old and unloved," Glimmer had hulked the moment she saw Bow waiting for her by their usual street corner.

"Oh no! What if something happened to her," Bow had said.

"Of course nothing happened," Glimmer wined as they walked down the street. "Once she got time to think about it, she realized I am a shallow bitch and wanted nothing to do with me."

"Or maybe she had to rush off, saving puppies from drowning," Bow countered.

"Or maybe she hates me," Glimmer sulked.

"I'm sure..." Bow begun, but then he silenced as Glimmer, white in the face, grabbed his arm.

"Bow!"

"Glimmer?"

"BOW!"

"Glimmer?"

"That's her!"

"Who?"

"Her!"

"Her?"

"HER!"

"Her?"

"BOW!"

"GLIMMER!"

Clinging to each other, they stared at the muscular blonde with a sports bag on the other side of the street who - rather sheepishly - tried to figure out how to navigate the app giving access to the electric rental scooters that littered the street.

"OMG!" Bow concluded.

"I know!" Glimmer whispered, trying without much success to hide her ogling by pretending to stare at a signpost on a street light promising a revolutionary new poodle shampoo.

"OMG!" Bow repeated.

"BOW!" Glimmer cried. "What shall I do?"

"Hmmmm," Bow said. "You need to figure out if she really meant to stand you up, or if she might be interested in another date."

"How am I supposed to do that?" Glimmer countered.

"Don't worry," he said with a broad smile. "I have a method that never fails."

"What do you..." she begun, but then her brain caught up with his words.

"Bow," she hissed, the moment he started to walk over the street with long strides. "Don't you dare."

But Bow had already walked up to Adora.

"Hello, miss," he said with a friendly smile. "Listen, I'm sorry if this is forward, but my friend thinks you are really pretty and wonder if she can buy you a coffee."

The blonde woman, who had watched him a bit cautiously to begin with, blinked a few times. A blush crept up along her neck.

"Oh!" she said. "Um... that's flattering, but..."

"You are not busy right now, are you?" Bow asked with happy voice.

"Well, not as such, but..."

"Great!" Bow said happily and turned to Glimmer who finally ran up to them to do damage control. "She'd love to have a coffee with you, Glimmer."

"You!" Adora gasped, suddenly white in her face.

"Um... hi?" Glimmer piped.

"This is a great place," Bow happily said without taking any notice of their discomfort, and with gentle nudges pushed them through the door to the closest place with an espresso machine.

"I'm... I'm so sorry about yesterday," Adora said, trying to both look and not look at Glimmer at the same time as she held the door open for her. "I... there was a... something..."

"Oh, it's OK," Glimmer stammered, eyes glued on Adora's strong arm holding the door. Too late she realized she stood in the door opening, staring like a buffoon and keeping Adora waiting. She 'eeeped' and ran in, seeking refuge with Bow who was over by the counter and just was about to order.

"...two vanilla latte with cream and sprinkles..." -he turned to Adora- "those are Glimmer's favourite, so I thought you could just as well get used to the taste" -ignoring Adora's deep blush he turned back to the barista- "those two will be for drinking here. And a cappuccino for me. To go."

He paid and took the paper cup from the counter, next to two china mugs, flowing over with creamy decadence.

"Enjoy your date," he said with a wink.

And then he was gone.

"Um..." Adora said.

"Um..." Glimmer said.

They blushed.

"I'm... I'm so sorry," Adora repeated. "You were so nice to me and I never meant to run off, but I..."

"I'm sure you had good reasons," Glimmer quickly said. "But you aren't going to run off on me now, are you?"

A shiver to her voice betrayed it was just not a teasing question.

"Of course not," Adora quickly said with a guilty look at her sports bag.

"Then let's find us a table," Glimmer said and took their mugs. She smiled in that way that made Adora's heart go pitter-pat. "Together this time."

They sat down by the window. For a moment they busied themselves with their mugs, neither knowing where to start.

"So... um... sorry if I made things... weird yesterday...?" Glimmer begun.

"Oh no," Adora quickly said. "You were perfectly... you were perfect..."

Her voice trailed off as her brain suddenly realized what her mouth was saying.

"I mean..." she begun, and then her voice trailed off again as Glimmer watched her without breathing, red as a tomato in her face.

"I'm perfect, am I?" Glimmer said, trying for teasing which was a mistake since her current emotional state made her sound like an affection starved squeak toy.

"Yes," Adora said with a tone of voice and an expression that cause Glimmer to outright melt in her seat.

"Um, I mean..." Adora immediately tried to back-paddle.

"Um..." Glimmer croaked.

They stared at each other.

"So... this is... going pretty well?" Glimmer managed.

"I have no idea," Adora said with helpless voice.

"Glimmer," Glimmer helplessly tried, holding out her hand.

"Adora!" Adora whispered, shaking it.

They stared at each other.

"Conversation?" Glimmer said, not letting go of Adora's hand.

"Yes!" Adora said, staring at Glimmer's beautiful face.

"Um... you are... new in town?" Glimmer tried, finally - reluctantly - letting go of Adora.

"Um... yeah," Adora said, desperately trying to remember how to form words. "I.. I came with the train yesterday, before we met."

"Oh!" Glimmer said, picking up on the conversation thread to stop herself drooling like an idiot over Adora's beautiful eyes. "Wasn't there a horrible delay? I heard there nearly was a crash?"

"Yeah," Adora mumbled, suddenly unhappy. "A gear was broken. Another train got on the same track as us."

"That's so scary," Glimmer said with wide eyes. "What happened."

"It... got sorted out," Adora muttered. "Anyway, that's why I was at the library yesterday. I was going to look for ads for someone looking for a room mate, but..."

"But I distracted you," Glimmer said. "Oh no, I'm so sorry."

"Don't be sorry," Adora gasped and held out her hand.

"Soooooo, you're still looking for somewhere to live then...?" Glimmer breathed, unconsciously playing with her moon-shaped ear ring.

"Ye-eah?" Adora squeaked, not daring to meet Glimmer's eyes.

"Because I.... might have a spare room," Glimmer whispered, red in her face... I live down by the Brightmoon high-rises in the old town, you might have seen them when you left the station.

"Wow!" Adora gasped. "The flats there must be incredibly expensive. How do you...?"

"Oh, that's nothing really," Glimmer said, looking embarrassed. "I just sort of... own them.... work there!" she quickly amended. "Lot's of meetings, really, haha. Terribly boring. But if you want to be girlfr... room mates perhaps we could.... try?"

Adora looked at her with longing in her eyes.

"I'm not sure that..." she begun.

"Oh, sorry!" Glimmer gasped. "I didn't mean to be so forward."

"Oh no," Adora gasped. "It's not that, it's only..."

Then she said nothing at all, on account of Glimmer's warm soft hand suddenly being placed on her cheek.

"..." she said, eyes large.

"Listen, Adora," Glimmer said with voice like a summer night. "I know we've just met. I know we don't know each other yet and I know I'm rushing things. But I like you... a lot actually, and I think you might like me to... a little?" She took a deep breath. "...so, maybe you might want to take a chance on a stranger? Come stay with me, just for a few days and we'll see if it works out."

"There is nothing I want more in the entire world," Adora heard her mouth say, staring like transfixed at Glimmer's eyes.

"There we go then," Glimmer said happily. "So it's settled then?"

"I... I..." Adora begun.

And then they saw it.

The truck that came crashing down the street outside the window, the driver frantically honking, but apparently with no means of slowing down the vehicle.

The two children in orange reflex vests running out in the street, chasing after a ball, completely obvious to the approaching danger.

The old woman painstakingly slowly navigating a cross-walk, in the direct path of the truck.

The cute puppy chasing its tail just next to the children.

Glimmer cried in fear and stood up, despite how utterly obvious it was that she wouldn't even make it to the door before it was too late.

Adora...

Adora rushed to her feet, the chair crashing to the floor behind her. She tore the sword out of the sports bag, she held it over her head...

"FOR THE HONOUR OF GRAYSKULL!"

Glimmer stared with open mouth as time seemed to stand still. Rainbows flowed in the air. Adora's entire being started to glow. Her hair flowed like a golden waterfall.

As the light died down, Adora was standing impossibly tall, dressed in white and gold with a red cape and a tiara with golden wings. She tossed the sword up in the air, smashed her fists together to form golden bracers on her arms. she twirled, the air lashing around her like a whip. A simply bitchin' musical chord was playing...

"...She-Ra?" Glimmer whispered, recognizing the legendary hero that so often featured in news reports whenever catastrophes were averted and lives saved.

With an apologetic look at her, Adora... She-Ra... smashed right through the large front window and with three mighty strides had caught up with the children on the road, still chasing their ball. She scoped them up in her strong arms, she grabbed the puppy and tossed it to her back where it desperately tried to stay put, she gave the ball a little kick and then she jumped. Straight up. Glimmer saw those magnificent legs muscles tense and then propel her at least two meter up in the air. She-Ra did a somersault, causing the puppy to yelp in fear and the kids to scream in joy, and landed just after the truck as it passed in breakneck speed.

She allowed the children and puppy to slide down and then she grabbed her sword, transforming it to a golden rope with a hook in the end. She tossed it to the truck and managed to snag the rear of it. With all her might she pulled, digging in her heels into the buckling asphalt. Glimmer held her breath as She-Ra strained under the load, the rope digging into her hands.

With only meters left, the truck finally slowed down, to finally stop just a few decimetre from the old woman, who completely unperturbed by these events gave the truck just next to her an annoyed look, and with a muttered 'Razzle Dazzle' trudged on.

She-Ra allowed her muscles to relax and let go of the rope, turning it into a sword again.

The final shards of the window hit the floor, and time started to flow normally again.

The children's parents ran up to them. The driver came running, white in her face, bystanders waved camera phones. In the middle of it all, She-Ra looked uncomfortable and sheepish.

"Um... the... fender should be fixable..." she muttered to the driver. "Sorry about the back shaft... Um, I hope I didn't scare the children... oh, of course you can take my picture... I tried to get your ball out of the way, it should be fine... nice dog... Oh! Glimmer!"

She desperately tried to keep a dialogue up with the driver, the kids parents, the dog's owner and several of the bystanders at the same time. Glimmer managed to get to the front of the crowd by the power of being the bossiest of them all. She stared at the shining hero.

"You're She-Ra?" she whispered.

"...yeah." She-Ra mumbled. "Sorry."

"Sorry?" Glimmer gasped. "You are a hero. You totally saved those kids."

"I destroyed the window, though," She-Ra said with a guilty look at the café.

"Who cares about the window?" Glimmer cried. "You stopped a truck with your bare hands."

"Yeah..." She-Ra muttered, looking uncomfortably at the groove in the street where her heels had dug in.

"And yesterday She-Ra got that sinking boat with the doggie show back to shore after she put the burning building out, "

Glimmer's mouth suddenly formed a little 'o' as the realization kicked in.

"Yeah," Adora said unhappily. "That's why I stood you up. Sorry."

"You're have nothing to apologize for!" Glimmer breathed and elbowed a bystander to the side who tried to get a word in. "You're helping so many people... before that, didn't She-Ra prevent a train crash... oh!"

"Yeah, I told you I came by train," Adora sighed.

"You are amazing!" Glimmer gasped.

"Sure. She-Ra is amazing," Adora muttered.

"But... you are She-Ra," Glimmer frowned, confused.

"It's... it's a job," Adora said. "I'm trying to do it as good as I can, but... I dunno. Mostly I just jump between crises. Also, it doesn't exactly pay the bills," she said with a rueful little laugh.

"Well," Glimmer said with warm voice, daring to touch She-Ra's strong arm. "There don't seem to be any puppies in need of rescuing right now, and you never got to finish your latte, so perhaps I could..."

"Help!" someone cried. "A bus full of orphans has fallen into the river!"

Adora gave Glimmer the most tired look she had ever seen.

"It's always like this," she whispered, clearly having to press down a sob. Then she took a deep breath, drew her sword and jumped atop a bike.

"I'm borrowing this, citizen!" she cried, and to Glimmer's amazement it sprouted wings.

"Onward, my noble steed," she cried, and she and the bike rushed through the streets, towards the river.

Glimmer stared after her with beating heart.

- - -

The sun was on its way up.

The streets were empty.

Only Adora was out, walking with heavy steps.

She had saved the bus. Then she had stopped a bursting sewage pipe from polluting the river. Then she saved a cat from a tree.

After that, things had got more hectic.

What the day hadn't included was a moment of time for herself. Or for Glimmer.

She looked forlornly at the Brightmoon highrises, so cheerful and bright against the city skyline. She imagined Glimmer sleeping somewhere in the tall building. Adora bet she had a big, cosy bed... maybe round? (Adora had no idea where she got that idea from. She told herself very sternly that she had no business thinking of Glimmer's bed anyway.). But more to the point, she imagined Glimmer to be warm. To be snug. To be safe.

She didn't even try to hide the sob. After all, no one was there to hear her.

That's why she was doing this, she reminded herself. To make people more safe. People like those kids, that old woman, the people on the bus... People like Glimmer...

She just wished it could sometimes be people like Adora, too.

She gave a parked electric scooter an annoyed look, and for the thousandth of time wished she could afford a smart phone advanced enough for the app that would unlock it, so she didn't have to spend so much time walking back every time She-Ra's heroics brought her miles from the starting point.

Not that she would be able to afford the scooter rent anyway.

Finally her steps brought her back to the café. She gave the cardboard taped to the window a guilty look. Hopefully the insurance would cover it. She idly wondered if it was worth looking for her sports bag. It was falling to pieces, but at least it was better than just lugging the sword around like she currently did.

She sighed.

"Hey, Adora!" Glimmer cried. "There you are!"

Adora spun around and she stared at the pink haired girl walking up towards her from a bus stop with quick steps.

"I thought you might come back here... or at least I hoped you would... you haven't been doing heroics all night, have you? I've been so worried about you... of course I know you can take care of yourself... um.... hi!"

Glimmer apparently suddenly realized she had been babbling, and stopped just a step shy of the staring Adora.

"What are you doing here?" Adora asked, incredulous.

Glimmer blushed and didn't meet her eyes.

"...looking for you," she said, somewhat sheepishly.

"Why?" Adora asked, somewhat forcefully.

Glimmer gave her a surprised look.

"What do you mean, why?"

"Like..." Adora gestured vaguely at the sky. "It's late. Or early I suppose. You've must been out here for hours."

"Well, you never gave me your phone number," Glimmer said with a sly look. "What did you expect me to do?"

"...go home?" Adora muttered.

"I kinda hope you would join me, remember?" Glimmer smiled, a warm smile.

For a moment Adora stared at Glimmer, completely at a loss for words, then she looked her in the eyes.

"Glimmer," she said with the most gentle voice Glimmer ever had heard. "We have known each other for two days. During that time I have run away from you twice."

"You came back, didn't you," Glimmer said with a cheeky tone of voice.

"It will always be like this," Adora whispered, tears in her eyes. "There will always be a next crises. There will always be someone else who needs saving. There will always be a need for She-Ra. If the two of us... were to... try to... Glimmer. There will never be just you and me. There will always be her."

Glimmer regarded her in silence for a moment, expression thoughtful. Then she held out her hand.

"Come," she said.

Gently but firmly, she dragged Adora over to the bus stop. They sat down on the narrow bench.

Adora didn't protest when Glimmer scuffled closer and leaned into her arms. She knew that this was goodbye. Could as well end with a cosy memory.

"'There will always be her'," Glimmer said thoughtfully. She looked up, catching Adora's eyes. "Someone said that to you, didn't they?"

"Yeah..." Adora admitted.

Glimmer watched her in silence for a few moments, listening attentively to all the things Adora didn't say.

"And now you feel your are doomed to live out your days without love, beholden to nothing but your mission, to never again cause another girl the same pain you caused your ex?" Glimmer went on, voice toneless. "Is that is?"

"Ye-eah?" Adora gulped.

Glimmer sighed.

"Well, nuts to that," she said.

"What?" Adora gasped.

"I get it, Adora," Glimmer said, voice full of compassion. "You have a job that demands a lot of you. I know about those. Always travelling. Always another meeting. every minute of the day in someone's schedule unless I fight to keep it for myself... and what you do is immensely more important than being a rich bitch in charge of a real estate company. You help people. Every day you make the world better. You are a hero, Adora."

"She-Ra is a hero," Adora muttered.

Glimmer smiled at her, a slightly sad smile. Then she bent forward and picked up a bag from the ground - a brand new sports bag - pink and purple and with a pattern of moons and stars.

"I... um... I bought you a new bag," she said. "I hope you don't mind. I saw the other was a bit... worn, so I thought maybe you could have a new one... and when you use it you.... might think about me?"

"You bought me a bag," Adora gasped.

"Well, mostly I needed a bag for the sandwiches," Glimmer said, a bit flustered, and then I thought of your sports bag, and..."

"Sandwiches?" Adora asked, her stomach giving a large grumble.

"I figured there is no lunch break for heroes," Glimmer said with a grin, and since you never actually got to the 'eating' part of any of our dates I figured..." she leaned forward - close enough or her hair to tickle Adora's nose - and zipped the back open. "Tadah! Breakfast!"

Adora stared at her with a complete loss for words.

"It's just egg sandwiches," Glimmer said, suddenly bashful, as she unpacked a few zip-bags and put on the bench between them. "And they are a bit crunchy because the eggs burnt because I had to get a new pan and apparently you have to 'pre-butter' a new pan (what does that even mean?) and then Bow teased me because he said then when I bought eggs I could just as well have bought pre-made sandwiches but I wanted to make you something real and my daddy always used to make egg sandwiches when we were on picknicks and I wanted to make that and I scraped off the most burnt parts anyway and...."

Her voice trailed off. Adora stared at her with tears in the eyes.

"You made me sandwiches..." she whispered, more as a statement than as a question.

"Yeah..." Glimmer confirmed. She opened a bag and handed Adora a piece of rather soggy bread with a burnt lump on top. "With egg. Sorry it's not very good."

Adora took a bite.

"It's the best thing I have ever eaten," Adora said with heartfelt voice and mouth full.

Glimmer breathed out.

"I have coffee for you too," she proudly said and took out a brand new purple thermoflask. "I didn't make it myself," she said defensively. "After the eggs I didn't feel confident to figure out how the coffee maker worked. So I had them fill it up at a café. And then Bow teased me and said that I could have got sandwiches from there as well but nuts to him. I can provide for my girl myself."

"'Your' girl?" Adora said with a raised eyebrow.

"Well, you know, if I get the job," Glimmer said flippantly - the effect ruined somewhat by how she glanced at Adora to gauge her reaction.

With some difficulty she unscrewed the lid and, using it as a cup she poured up warm, brown deliciousness, mixed with some suspicious-looking brown lumps.

"NOW what?" Glimmer whined. She picked up one of the lumps. "It's paper. Did they leave an instruction sheet in the thermoflask It's a thermoflask! What kind of idiot needs an instruction sheet? Why didn't they check it in the café? I will..."

In the meantime Adora had taken the lid-cup from her and sipped it. It tasted like heaven and she told Glimmer so.

"Is it OK?" Glimmer said hopefully.

"It's perfect," Adora said. She held up the sandwich and the cup and gesticulated at Glimmer. "You are perfect."

"Stop..." Glimmer mumbled, red in her face. "It was the bare minimum I could give you and I still messed it up."

"You waited for me the entire night to give me breakfast," Adora whispered. "That's the most thoughtful thing I've ever..."

"So, does that mean you will keep me?" Glimmer said with a hopeful grin.

"Glimmer..." Adora said, voice suddenly sad.

Glimmer held up her hand.

"I know, I know, you have your hero-gig. You worry that it will take all of your time, that there won't be anything left for me. But even heroes need to eat. Even heroes need somewhere to sleep. And I bet heroes sometimes needs snuggles too?" she smirked as Adora suddenly blushed bright red.

Glimmer's voice grew more serious.

"Look at me, Adora." (Adora did!) "I spend all my times in meetings or celebrity events. I'd starve to death if I went a day without phone and credit card and a catering firm. I struggle to make a fucking sandwich. I also worry that my job won't make it possible for me to... be with someone." She held out her hand. "But I do want to be with you. Can we try to make it work?"

Adora quickly swallowed the last gulp of her sandwich and gave Glimmer a look of pure, undiluted longing.

"But She-..." she begun.

"Yes, She-Ra will always be there," Glimmer said, voice serene. "I heard you the first time. I respect that. You do a lot of good, and I want you to continue doing that."

She gently took Adora's coffee cup and put it down. She took Adora by both hands.

"But at the same time I will be there to remind you that Adora will always be there to. Adora also has needs and wants. If nothing else, when She-Ra has had a long night, making the word better for everyone, then at least I can make Adora some burnt egg sandwiches and disgusting coffee."

Glimmer leaned forward, the raising sun shrouding her hair in a halo of light, her face filling Adora's entire world.

"...and then Adora can be my hero," she whispered.

Chapter End Notes

> Glimmer Mary Janing for Adora/She-Ra has potential! I'm flagging the story finished for now, but I just might add a chapter or two in time.

Good night, hero

Adora laid as still as she could in the enormous round bed, not to disturb the woman next to her. Glimmer was curled up in a little ball under her weighted blanket, muttering to herself in her sleep.

Adora still couldn't believe it, couldn't believe any of it. The bed. The room. The apartment. The woman that slept by her side. Glimmer. Her girlfriend.

Girlfriend.

She, Adora, was currently laying in a bed together with her girlfriend. Glimmer. Glimmer was the girlfriend. Her girlfriend. Adora's.

Adora ran that concept through her mind a few times.

It still didn't compute.

She decided to break the concept down in smaller chunks.

She had been down in the harbour districts, stopping a ferry collision. After that there had been a scaffolding on a building site on the verge of collapsing and then some drunk drivers. All in all a calm night for She-Ra.

And then... Adora savoured the thought... then she had walked home. Because she actually lived somewhere (and with someone). She had been let in by the doorman in the almost ridiculous fancy building where Glimmer... where she and Glimmer lived and taken the elevator all the way up to the penthouse and opened the door with her key, because she lived there. In Glimmer's apartment.

With Glimmer.

The apartment, as always smelt wonderfully of that fancy carpet wash Glimmer's cleaning firm used and that fancy coffee she liked and that fancy shampoo that always made her her smell so very special.

Adora nuzzled closer to the sleeping woman and buried her face in her hair. Glimmer made a content little sound that made Adora's heart melt.

She had tiptoed to the kitchen and found that Glimmer had left her a note, on pink heart shaped paper.

Well, it was more of a small booklet of notes. The first wishing her welcome home, the second telling her that Glimmer loved her (Adora took a quick break to assure the sleeping Glimmer that she loved her too), the third explaining that Glimmer had made her coffee. Adora took a grateful sip from the thermoflask, even if it tasted more like tar than anything else. The fourth to seventh notes detailed Glimmer's fight with the coffee maker, ending in a stall mate and the far too strong coffee that Adora currently enjoyed.

The eight note... Adora blushed and sternly told herself not to think of the eight note right now.

(But possibly in the morning...?)

Glimmer smirked in her sleep.

Adora lay in the bed, nuzzling close to the warm bundle of cosiness that was her girlfriend, smelling her shampoo and listening to the frankly adorable little sounds she made in her sleep.

Adora couldn't believe it, couldn't believe that something like this could happen to someone like her.

But perhaps she didn't have to.

Perhaps it was enough that Glimmer believed in her.

"Good night, Glimmer," she whispered and fondly touched Glimmer's cheek.

Breakfast for the hero

Normally when the alarm bell rang, Glimmer would have snoozed, slept, threatened physical violence, performed physical violence and finally - grudgingly - left bed only when her personal assistant arrived at the door with bribes in the form of expensive take away latte and begged her to get up.

This time she sat straight up at the first signal and quickly silenced the shrieking thing.

She took a deep breath and blinked a few times, trying to figure out the difference between dreams and reality.

She looked at the blonde woman, snoring next to her.

Still dream, then.

But somehow, dream had became reality.

And Glimmer would not allow the evils of the world (in the form of an alarm clock) to hurt her darling hero, not now when she finally got some sleep.

Adora hadn't come home until three o clock this night, smelling of smoke and with bits of gravel in her hair. Glimmer had not asked what heroics She-Ra had engaged it, instead she had led Adora to the shower, given her a sandwich that had pretty much been inhaled, plopped her in bed and then simply plopped herself on top of her as an exceptionally clingy weighted blanket.

Adora had been asleep not more than thirty seconds after that.

Now she still burrowed like a groundhog in the bed. Glimmer watched her fondly and gently bent down to peck a little kiss on her cheek. Then she made sure the blanket covered her, put her feet in her pink slippers, put on her pink bathrobe and left the room, closing the door behind her.

Glimmer tripped out to the kitchen. She glared evilly at the coffee maker and then took a store bought Starbucks cold coffee from the fridge instead. She was not afraid of the coffee maker! Of course she wasn't! But she was a strong independent business woman and as such could not be expected to play mind games with some Italian evil coffee maker engineer madman, and that before she had got her first cup of coffee of the day! (Glimmer had immediately spotted the flaw in that logistic chain).

She wowed that when Adora woke up she would wake up to the smell of freshly made coffee.

She glared at the toaster.

And toast.

But first she had her meetings to attend to.

Work, work, work.

She shrugged of the robe and left it in a (pink) pile on the floor and slipped in her semi-casual (but still fetching) business dress top (pink) and a pair of sweaters. She opened her (pink) laptop lid and opened the telecommunication app. She smiled into her expensive web camera.

"Good morning, Mrs city secretary," she smiled. "I'm so glad to see you."

"Good morning, Miss Moon," the civil servant smiled back at her. "I'm so glad you could take the time for a little informal chat."

"Oh, absolutely," Glimmer smiled. "After all, I'm very eager for a good relationship with city hall."

"And we are happy for a good working relationship with our city's large property owners," the secretary smiled.

They smiled at each other.

They knew where they stood.

"So..." the secretary said, "for the upcoming funding run for the campaign we do remember that you previously has been a very generous contributor..." she let the sentence trail off.

"Ah, of course," Glimmer said. "I so love contributing to campaigns..."

Sweet smile.

The secretary sighed.

"Miss Moon, if there is any issue you feel need to be looked into we would be happy to..."

"I'm so happy you asked," Glimmer said with a bright smile.

"The issue of the property tax is currently..." the secretary begun, but Glimmer waved her off.

"No, no, nothing like that. I want to talk about first responders response time."

The secretary blinked.

"Um... what?"

"According to the latest reports, the response times of this town specifically is down fifteen percent compared to the national median," Glimmer said with serious voice. "Bottlenecks are identified in emergency call central staffing, telecom equipment and maintenance of the vehicle fleet."

"Oh..." the secretary said, desperately struggling to catch up on this unexpected angle.

"Furthermore," Glimmer said, "first responders unions raise issues of mismanagement, communication issues and harassment allegations not properly investigated." She gave the web camera a stern look. "You can see how, as one of our city's large property owners, this is troubling to me."

"Ah, yes, obviously..." the secretary said, furiously scrolling through pdf files as she talked. "Um, and obviously we take these issues very seriously and look into them... um... however, I think you will find that that same report you cited also note that the actual loss of property is down, despite the perceived shortcomings in the first response infrastructure, which suggests that..."

"Which suggests that someone else is picking up the slack," Glimmer hissed, quick as a viper. "Someone who has to be there every time the official institutions fail, someone who will beat herself up if she ever misses a call, someone who hasn't had a full nights sleep in weeks." She glared at the screen. "Which, I think you will agree, is not a proper way for a modern city to protect it's citizens."

The secretary hesitated. While not exactly official that the legendary hero She-Ra was in a relationship with the heiress of the Moon Inc real estate empire, it was not exactly a secret either, and the paparazzi had been very happy to provide city hall with plenty of gossip.

Including how protective the Moon Inc CO seemed to be of her girlfriend's time and health.

"...Ah, yes, like I was going to say, we are currently preparing a report on how we plan to address the issues you highlighted, which is a high priority from city hall, and then..."

"...and once I have seen the report, we can go on to discuss campaign contributions," Glimmer said, voice sweet. "Thank you so much. That will be all for now."

Glimmer closed the (pink) laptop lid, happy with herself.

Who was making the world just a little bit more likely to give her girlfriend a sleep-in, one democratically dubious preventive safety measure at the time? This gal.

She grinned and walked back to the kitchen, tossing off her jacket in a little pile (pink) and putting on her robe again.

Fuck it, she was amazing. She could do anything.

"Let's fucking dance," she growled at the toaster.

- - -

Adora woke up by the fire alarm. A short moment the hero inside her was on full alert, assessing the danger. But as finely tuned senses sniffed the air but got nothing but the smell of burnt toast, listened for screams or running feet but got nothing but Glimmer's frustrated swearing, the hero relaxed, happy in the knowledge that as for this moment, she was not needed.

With a happy squee Adora rolled out of bed. She snatched up her white robe - her new, fluffy white bathrobe that her girlfriend had bought her, and walked out to the hallway where Glimmer was furiously jumping up and down, trying to reach the fire alarm. Adora reached up and pulled the battery out of the alarm, and at the same time she leaned down and gave Glimmer a little peck on the head.

"Morning, honey," she grinned.

"Oh no, I'm so sorry Adora," Glimmer moaned. "You were supposed to sleep in and I ruined it."

"I got to wake up to breakfast with my wonderful girl," Adora beamed and wrapped the robe around her, making sure to wrap Glimmer into a hug at the same time. Glimmer, suddenly encased in a word of soft, fluffy bathrobe and bedwarm girlfriend felt her anger disappear in a moment.

"I burnt the toast," Glimmer mumbled with her face full of boobs. "Sorry."

"Don't worry about it," Adora happily said and squeezed Glimmer tighter. "They are crunchier that way. And is it coffee I smell?"

"Yeah, it totally is!" Glimmer said, suddenly happier. "I made coffee," she clarified. "With the coffee maker."

"My hero," Adora laughed, making Glimmer all hot inside. A flustered face peaked up at Adora from under her robe.

"Um... Adora..." Glimmer said, suddenly bashful. "Could... could you call me 'your hero' again? It's kinda... doing it for me."

Adora did.

Glimmer was most grateful.

A hero's date

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It was finally happening!

Glimmer and Adora was going to have a full day together.

Glimmer had cleared her calendar. She had re-cleared it. She had very, very carefully explained to her personal assistants that she was not to be disturbed unless it was a life or death situation (and implied that if she was, she might very well be creative when it came to just who's death).

She had booked a table at her favourite café. And that bought tickets to the zoo. And then there was that little ridiculously overpriced spa with the oversized hot tubs...

Now she eagerly waited for Adora to show up.

She knew Adora would show up at any moment, there had just been a small problem at the interstate that She-Ra had to sort out.

Surely that would be all that happened today.

A woman, taller than her (not that it was very unusual), sat by a nearby table. She was strikingly beautiful, with dark skin and long hair in a high ponytail. She had a purple choker that for some reason made Glimmer's fingers itch to take it off...

Glimmer Moon, you're here waiting for your wonderful girlfriend. Stay focused! Glimmer sternly told herself, and then suddenly sat straight up as she realized the woman was watching her with an amused expression.

"Um... can I help you?" Glimmer said in a not-so-stellar recovery. The woman laughed (a pearly, perfect laughter) and moved her chair closer, causing Glimmer's heartbeat to increase alarmingly.

"Oh no, I don't want to be a bother," she said in an posh sounding accent. "I just wanted to meet you."

"You know who I am?" Glimmer said, eyes narrowing suspiciously.

"Oh, I heard about you," the woman said. "From Adora," she clarified.

"You know Adora?" Glimmer asked, staring at the woman with a new aspect of threat assessment in her eyes.

"I have known her for a long time," the woman smiled.

"Are you her ex?" Glimmer asked and crossed her arms.

The woman looked taken aback, but then laughed again.

"Oh, oh no, nothing like that. We're just... colleges, I suppose you could say, but I like to think of us as friends." She leaned forward. "I just wanted to see the woman who has made her so happy lately."

"Oh," Glimmer said, suddenly flustered. "I... I suppose I try..."

"You are just what she needs," the woman smiled. "I'm just wanted to say... thank you. Thank you for taking care of her."

"Oh..." Glimmer said, for once at a complete loss for words. "Um... I..."

"Glimmer!" Adora cried apologetically as she came running, out of breath. "I'm so sorry I'm late. There was this zeppelin that caught fire and after that there was a cat stuck in a tree but I hurried as much as I could but... Oh hi Mara, what are you doing here?"

"Adora!" the woman said with warm voice. She stood up and gave Adora a gentle hug. "I just dropped by. I wanted to see her for myself." She nodded at the flustered Glimmer.

"Oh..." Adora blushed. "Um, well, she's great, isn't she?"

"She's adorable," Mara teased. "And since I heard that the two of you have a date together I just wanted to..."

"HELP!" a voice cried out. "LITTLE TIMMY HAS FALLEN DOWN A WELL!"

Adora sighed. She gave Glimmer an apologetic look.

"Listen, Glimmer," she said. "I'm very sorry and I promise I'll be back as soon as..."

"FOR THE HONOUR OF GRAYSKULL!" Mara cried out, and to Glimmer's amazement, a familiar transformation sequence played out.

"You will enjoy your date," She-Ra said to the suddenly speechless Adora. "And I will keep an eye on your city while you do so. As of now, you have a day off." She winked. "Make the most of it."

"Tha..thanks," Adora whispered, eyes full of tears of gratitude.

"You are worth it," She-Ra said, and then she stood up and started to run. "DON'T WORRY, LITTLE TIMMY! HELP IS COMING!"

Chapter End Notes

This is all I have for now, but I'm sure I'll find a reason to come back to this adorable itiration of glimmadora eventually.

Oh no! Glimmer is kidnapped again!

"What do you goons think you're doing?" the pink haired woman in a smart, black business suit screamed in fury as she was roughly pushed into the back of a van, her hands handcuffed behind her. "Don't you know who I am?"

"You are our ticket for a big ransom," a woman in ski mask said with cold voice. "Just stay calm, Miss Moon, and no damage will befall you."

"Befall ME? Glimmer snarled, bouncing to her feet and rushing towards her kidnappers like a tiny rugby player. "Worry about yourself! I'll... BDFDFJMMMRMJJJJN!"

"Play nice," the woman coldly said and lowered her taser, or I will not be this lenient next time.

"Fucking.... fucker..." Glimmer wheezed from the floor, apparently struggling to come up with a suitable insult. She made an attempt to wriggle to the side as the woman with businesslike efficiency padlocked her handcuffs to a metal hoop fastened in the bed of the van.

The woman did not take any further notice of Glimmer. "Watch her," she said to her co-kidnapper, a shorter man with blonde hair clearly visible under his mask. She handed him a cattle prod that he fumbled not to drop.

"Of course, Lonnie," he answered and was met with a withering look.

"Don't use our real names!"

"Sorry Lo... um... boss," he nervously said.

"Yeah, you just walk away, Lonnie!" Glimmer screamed after her. "I'll kick your butt so hard they have to look for it in ORBIT, Lonnie!"

The woman snorted and slammed the van door shut. A moment later a car door slammed and the van started to move.

Glimmer glared at the man. The man looked at his feet.

"Well?" Glimmer demanded. "Got anything to say for yourself?"

"M... m'am?" the man squeaked.

"I'm supposed to be in a meeting about the quarterly budget! What do you think they will do without me in the quarterly budget meeting?"

"...sorry, m'am?"

Glimmer shrugged, her fury suddenly gone like if she'd flicked off a switch. "Eh, don't worry about it. Honestly, they'll probably be glad I'm not there to whine about the colours of their pie charts. They can run the meeting just as well without me."

She sighed and gave her captor a sad look. "Only... they always have those little cream cakes at the quarterly budget meetings, and I haven't had any treats today, so I really looked forward to them."

"...sorry...?"

Glimmer unblinkingly stared him in the eyes. "Because of you I didn't get the to have any cream cakes."

The kidnapper started to sweat "...sorry!"

"Because of you, I haven't yet HAD ANY COFFEE!"

The kidnapper pressed himself backwards, against the side of the van!

"WELL?" Glimmer shouted.

"SORRY!" he squeaked.

"You will be, unless you get me a candy bar RIGHT NOW!"

"HEY! STOP THAT RUCKUS!" Lonnie yelled from the front seat and banged the metal wall that separated them.

"I'M RUCKUSSING AS MUCH AS I WANT!" Glimmer yelled back and kicked the side of the car with all her might.

"KEEP HER UNDER CONTROL, KYLE!" Lonnie shouted.

"Hah! Made her say your name," Glimmer said with smug voice. She gave the trembling Kyle a sweet smile. "It's OK. You're doing quite well for the first time."

"How do you know that it's our first time?" Kyle asked, eyes wide.

"Because you fell for an easy line like that, for starters," Glimmer sniggered. She sat down more comfortably, her back against the cold metal side of the van. "Listen, it's not my first time being kidnapped. It's not my first time this MONTH. Seems like everyone learnt about the Moon company being inherited by a...' -she made a face- "'little girl', and they all got in their head to kidnap me. Your attempt is not the worst, by any stretch. There was an idiot who called himself 'Tung Lashor' who didn't even make it out of the parking garage."

"...oh..."

Glimmer gave Kyle a serious look. "You know you won't get away with this, right? Even if you manage to keep me for long enough to get the ransom payed out, we will catch you afterwards."

"Not if we lay low in the countryside..." Kyle begun then quickly shut his mouth.

"Yeah, you shouldn't tell me these things," Glimmer said and stretched as well as she could, making herself more comfortable. "But it will soon be a moot point anyway."

"It... will?"

Glimmer yawned. "Yeah, I'm escaping in a little while. I'm just waiting long enough to be sure they're done with the budget meeting."

"You can't escape," he objected. "You're chained up."

Glimmer scoffed. "That? Don't be silly. The padlock is not even on any more."

"WHAT?" he rushed forward to look. To his relief, the padlock was as secure as when Lonnie locked it. The relief was short lived, however, as Glimmer smashed her head against his with all her might, knocking him out cold.

"Aow, aow, aow!" Glimmer muttered. "Jerk," she added and pulled the unconcious Kyle closer with her legs so she, after some fumbling, had managed to rifle through his pockets.

"No keys. Just great." She perked up as she after some more fumbling realised the unconscious kidnapper's phone was fingerprint locked, and that she thus could access it. She quickly tapped in a number from muscle memory alone and turned on the loud speaker.

"Hello! My name is Glimmer Moon. You guys do deliveries, right? Marvellous. A bagel with cream cheese, some sort of cake - surprise me - and the largest caramel latte you can legally sell me. And don't go easy on the syrup, you hear me? You can deliver to the phone's location, right? Yeah, we're moving but we'll stop soon. You can deliver to that location? Yes, I know it's outside of town. I'll pay extra. Don't worry. You'll get the tip of a lifetime. Oh, and call the police and tell them I'm kidnapped and tell them where we stop. Yes, you heard me correctly. BUT DON'T FORGET MY LATTE!"

Feeling much better about herself with the prospect of caramel latte with extra syrup on the way, she banged the wall with her foot.

"Help! Help! Kyle is sick!" she shouted.

"I'm really not in the mood, Miss Moon," Lonnie shouted back.

"OK, fine, if you don't care I'll just throw him out of the van," Glimmer shouted back.

A third person muttered something that Glimmer couldn't make out, and then Lonnie banged the van wall again. "Kyle! Please tell me you didn't let the hostage knock you out."

"Sorry to make you disappointed!" Glimmer yelled.

Lonnie swore silently, and then Kyle's phone started to ring. Glimmer swiped the screen with her thumb behind her back.

"Kyle's phone. He can unfortunately not answer right now. Can I take a message?"

"FUCK!" Lonnie shouted, and a moment later the van screeched to a halt. Glimmer heard running footsteps, and the van door was flung open. Lonnie stood in the opening together with a huge man with a ski mask of his own, staring in disgust at the unconscious Kyle.

"You're in for it now!" she snarled.

"Come and get some, jerk!" Glimmer answered and, the moment Lonnie was within reach quickly brought up both her feet, holding the cattle prod she had stolen from Kyle.

"Shit!" Lonnie yelled and jerked back. Glimmer managed to swipe her legs to the side, and when Lonnie fell, Glimmer kicked hard at her hands. She pulled the taser close, and before Lonnie had got back to her feet, Glimmer had managed to turn around, grab the taser and pull the trigger.

"HAHA!" she panted as Lonnie fell to the floor, shaking helplessly. Then she looked up at the enormous man who loomed over her. "Um, would you give me time to reload the taser?" she hopefully said.

The man growled at her and reached down towards her with hands large as her head.

"I'll take that as a no," she sighed. "But there is one other thing you should know..."

The kidnapper hesitated. Glimmer counted down in her head. Three, two, one...

Her eyes suddenly widened as she stared at the open van doors behind the kidnapper. He hesitated, and then spun around as a phone signal started to play.

He was only fooled for a moment before he saw that the door opening behind him was empty, and that Kyle's phone was lying on the floor, apparently being set to ring on a timer. But that was enough distraction for Glimmer to kick at his legs with all her might, and when he fell, to grab his head with her feet and smash it repeatedly into the side of the van with a sound like a car crash. After a moment of hesitation she grabbed Lonnie's head and smashed that into the floor as well.

Contently Glimmer regarded her handiwork. The three kidnappers were unconcious around her. The van stood still and coffee was on its way.

"Good girl! You have deserved your treats," Glimmer told herself. She pulled Lonnie closer with her legs and managed to fish out the padlock key. After some fiddling she unlocked the padlock and, rubbing her wrists, stood up. She gave Kyle - who started to came to - a cheeky grin and walked towards the door.

"Don't feel bad, you were pretty good, all things considered. But now I have a hot date with a sweet coffee, so..."

A boom, like thunder, suddenly tore through the air. Glimmer stopped in her tracks as if struck by lighting. "No, no, no! She was supposed to have a sleep-in this morning."

The sky was lit up by a bright light, like, well, lighting. The thundering sound came closer.

"I didn't want her to worry about me," Glimmer muttered, "but now when she's here..." She closed the van door and quickly walked back to the other end. She mussed her hair and blinked rapidly, managing to squeeze out a few tears. After a moment of hesitation she opened a button in her blouse. "How do I look?"

Kyle stared at her, desperately trying to figure out what was going on. "Wha...?"

"She loves her a damsel in distress," Glimmer said, as if that answered anything. She sat down and clipped the handcuffs around her wrists and the hoop again.

Kyle stared at the a moment ago unkidnapped woman, who by all appearance now was a prisoner again. "Wha...?"

"Just stand to the side," Glimmer instructed him. "You'll probably be all right."

Kyle opened his mouth again, but before he had time to say anything, a horrible crunch was heard and bright light flooded the van as the entire back section of it had been torn off. A woman stood in the opening, shining like the sun. "GLIMMER?" she cried, voice full of fury and worry.

"Oh, Adora!" Glimmer gasped. "I've been so afraid..."

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!