A Heart Full Of Love

by mariuspunmercy

Summary

When Glimmer and Bow bet Adora she can't ask Catra to prom before the end of the spring musical, she gets frustrated with her feelings.

So what do you do when you've got a bunch of pent up frustration?

You duke it out in the Denny's parking lot with your crush in a lightsaber duel.

She-Ra Week Day 5

Prompt: PRINCESS PROM / healing

Notes

title from "a heart full of love" from les miserables :D

"You're not gonna do it."

"I am not gonna do it," Adora said dramatically as they stepped off the stage after finishing Act Two.

Their school, after constant begging, had finally decided to do a production of Les Miserables. After doing things like Seussical (they don't talk about that) and High School Musical (nothing wrong with it, just mundane), the theatre department wanted something more serious. Something that would challenge them.

So they forced their director, Double Trouble, to fight with the school about doing Les Mis. Despite some of the… suggestive stuff from the show, the school probably didn't want to fight some theatre kids, and let them have their show.

The audition process is always the scariest. Being a soprano, she only had one role really available to her: Cosette. Glimmer and Bow peer pressured her into auditioning for a lead instead of going straight to ensamble, and she still wasn't going to do it, but then Catra asked her to do it, and she couldn't say no.

Adora ended up cast as Cosette, and she had practically cried of happiness when the cast list came out. Glimmer had gotten Fantine, being a very low mezzo. But then Catra's name was listed for Eponine, and she just about proposed right there.

They were far from love interests. In fact, they were love rivals. Sea Hawk was the one playing Marius, and the two girls spent the entire show in love with him, which wasn't the funnest. Neither of them even liked boys, so for Catra's character to die because she was delivering a letter to Marius… It was a trip.

Even if they weren't true love interests, and only shared one song with each other that wasn't the Act One finale, Catra and Adora still spent the most time in rehearsal together. Ironic, because the one song was called A Heart Full Of Love, and it's Adora's hardest song, in her opinion.

She gushed about Catra to Bow and Glimmer everyday in the car home from rehearsal. "Guys, I think my heart is full of love. Would it be weird to ask Double Trouble to switch Marius and Eponine? I'd rather spend the whole show simping about Catra then Sea Hawk-"

"Adora!" Glimmer cut off. "You've been halfway in love with Catra since Seussical, and I think that's saying something. You should tell her. What's the worst that can happen?"

"She rejects me, never talks to me again, drops out of the show, and I can't spend the rest of senior year with her or college, since we're both going to University of San Diego together to major in theatre, and she'll never want to be in another role with me!"

"You're freaking out again," Bow childed, not turning away from the street as he drove. "You know Catra isn't like that. And I don't think she'll reject you in the first place."

"I am so tired of hearing Adora talk about Catra when Catra probably likes her back," Glimmer growled. "I'm going to do something about it."

She reached into her pocket, and Adora almost hopped over the console. She thought they were going to call Catra and tell her something, and it was enough to make her take off her seatbelt, despite Bow's car safety. "Glimmer, wait-"

Instead, she pulled out her wallet. "I will give you fifty dollars if you ask Catra to Princess Prom as a romantic date. I'll double the offer if you do it before closing night."

"An extra twenty if she says yes!" Bow chimed in.

Glimmer and Bow don't struggle with money, so a hundred wasn't a lot for them, but Adora's eyes grew wide as she thought about it. Of course, it involved asking Catra out, but she'd figure that out later. "You have a deal."

“Now please put your seatbelt back on!” Bow screeched, his voice cracking.

Which brought them to now, as they got into position for curtain call. She’d be bowing with Sea Hawk after Catra had hers with Kyle (who played Enjorlas, and it’s still shrouded in mystery how he got the role). Glimmer was one of the first to bow, but she still caught the wink as she walked away.

“That thing is huge,” Catra mumbled when she got in line backstage, waiting for their cue.

Adora looked down at her costume. The huge wedding dress wasn’t her favorite costume from the show, but it couldn’t be more appropriate for the moment (or inappropriate, take the pick). Catra couldn’t look more beautiful in her sleeveless white shirt and brown skirt that hit the floor. Despite the fact that the belt on her waist was big on her and she had dirt slathered all over her, she’s never looked better. Plus the red cap… That stupid thing was going to be the death of her.

“It’s always been like this,” Adora replied, falling into her place next to Sea Hawk, who busied himself with Kyle. Her heart thumped with the question. She doubted Catra had feelings for her, but she could always ask as a friend. Not like Glimmer and Bow needed to know anyways…

Bow had been a life saver in tech. He always knew when to turn off people’s mics, including that one time he turned off Catra’s when she started shit talking principal Hordak backstage when he came to watch rehearsal. Luckily, he turned them off now as Adora made her attempts to approach the subject.

“Princess Prom.” That’s not a question, it’s a statement! “Uh, I mean…”

“Catra, you and Kyle are next,” Scorpia, their stage manager, said.

Catra nodded, then turned back to her. “So, this is it, huh.. Our last curtain call as seniors, being cast as the leads for the first time, our last show in general until San Diego.”

“Don’t remind me.” She already cried in her car as she drove herself and Catra to school, emotional about ending her last show already. Closing nights are always a mess, but it just hits differently as seniors, and when you’re playing love rivals with the girl you’re pretty in love with.

“I’ll see you on the flip side,” she whispered before she ran out on stage, the bright lights shining down on her.

Even though Adora could only see Catra’s back, they were both sad about this being their last show. They had identical tears pricking their eyes, and when she rushed off stage with Kyle, she braced herself for the emotions to come.

She took Sea Hawk’s hand, and they ran to center stage when Scorpia gave them their cue. She couldn’t stop the tears from coming, even as she bunched her dress in her hands to give the curtsey bow. Sea Hawk did the Jeremy Jordan bow, where he clasps his hands in front of him and takes his bow.

Their last show…

The cast got into a line going horizontal, pointing to their lovely orchestra for their part of the bow. They started to make their way backstage again, and Adora took Catra’s hand. For emotional support, you know? She wasn’t going to see the blinding lights or the tech week shenanigans or the mic taped to her forehead in high school again! Obviously she’s going to be very dramatic about it.

As the cast made their way to the green room, everyone was in the same mood: sad. Catra had opted for letting go of her hand to wrap an arm around her shoulders as they silently sniffled. She was going to miss this…

“Closing night isn’t over, people!” Sea Hawk shouted, pumping a fist into the air. “Let’s go say goodbye to Double Trouble, and head over to Denny's!”

Ah, yes. The theatre kid ritual. Every show, they have to go to Denny'safter closing. It’s the law, and she looked forward to it every time. It always created the best memories, like when the obnoxious senior from last year, Octavia, got arrested for stealing a shopping cart.

Denny's always made her night.

“He’s not wrong,” Catra said to her. “Am I driving with you?”

“Duh.” Wasn’t that a given? Or was it too forward to assume. Or maybe-

“That’s what I thought.”

But when they stepped into the green room, all thoughts of Catra disappeared (for one second exactly) as Double Trouble walked in, whopping loudly. They gave their speech about this being one of the funnest shows to do, but Adora was too busy wiping her wet cheeks to really listen.

“Go out there, kids, and rule the goddamn theatre world!” Double Trouble finished, dismissing them for the night.

“To Denny's!” Glimmer exclaimed, giving everyone the pick-me-up they needed.

“To Denny's,” Catra repeated to her, quieter. To Denny'sit was. They walked to the parking lot, heading to her car, but Glimmer caught her wrist as she was opening her door.

“You only have a couple hours left. Use them wisely.” Satisfied with her words of wisdom, Glimmer got into the passenger side of Bow’s car parked next to them.

“I’m really going to kill them,” Adora whispered to herself as she put the key into the ignition. Her little yellow beetle may not be anything for any other high school kid, but it was perfect for her.

“Why?” Catra asked, having apparently heard her. Rats.

“Because.” And it was left at that before Adora opened her mouth again. “Princess Prom. That’s a thing that’s going on. It’s going on very soon. Like, in a month soon.”

“Yes, what about it?” Catra seemed so dismissive of it. She looked out the window, listening to Somebody’s Watching Me on the radio. Was she even going to go? What if she asked and Catra had no plans of going, and Adora’s unknowingly forcing her into it?

“Nothing.”

“Oh…” Catra traced the window with her nail. Now why was she all deflated? This girl is way too confusing for her brain. “I want to go, but I don’t want to be alone.”

Adora is going to kill someone. Seriously, all it would take is driving the car into Denny's. “Really? You’re going?”

“Not as of right now, but I kind of want to. Like I wouldn’t wear a dress or heels. But… I would want to wear a suit and maybe get my nails a color that isn’t black. But I don’t know who I’d go with.”

She momentarily turned away from the road to look at Catra. Bow would be screaming at her right now, but she couldn’t find it in her to care. She was basically given an invitation to ask, but what if Catra didn’t want her to ask? What if she’s just talking about it? What if she wants Adora to set her up with someone else?

Catra opened her mouth to say something, but she got distracted by something gleaming in the backseat. “There’s no way I didn’t notice these earlier!”

She reached into the back, leaning across the console. Her white sweater rode up on her waist, and Adora exploded into a blush at the sight of some skin. Seriously, what is wrong with her? And because she doesn't get cold, she wore a cropped red cami and regular black jeans. Her outfit did nothing to hide the blush.

Catra came back up, holding the hilt of two lightsabers. They were both big Star Wars nerds, and she spent thirty dollars (each) on these sabers. But the money from the bet would pay it back, if she actually did it. Catra dove into the backseat again, bringing the two sticks of plastic that she fastened back onto the hilt.

She pressed a button, and the blue light from Anakin Skywalker's lightsaber lit up the car. Catra stared at the saber, and Adora couldn't help but notice how her skin managed to light up perfectly in the blue light. "Try the red."

Catra turned off the blue saber, and grabbed a hold of Darth Vader's lightsaber. The red added a dangerous feeling to the atmosphere. Blue was fun and playful. Red was full of passion, and the silence that followed afterward proved her point.

Finally, Catra cleared her throat, moving the saber around a bit. "Oh, I like this one."

"But I like that one," Adora protested as she pulled into a parking space at Denny's. She could see everyone had already arrived. Not like she was driving slower than usual just to get a couple more seconds of conversation. No doubt they would see the red light and question what they were doing.

She pointed the end of the saber at Adora. "Well then, I guess it's going to have to be a duel to the fate."

Adora rolled her eyes at the reference, but grabbed the blue saber from the console, igniting it with the push of a button. "Okay, Eponine 'I Died Delivering A Letter To My Love Interest That Was Actually About Another Girl' Thénardier."

"That's the show's fault, not mine."

"Unimportant."

Catra opened the car door, bouncing to Adora's side within seconds. She hastily took off her seatbelt, practically sprinting out of the driver's seat, spinning the hilt in her hand. “I’m pretty sure you’ve never fought with one of these.”

Adora scoffed. “I own them.”

“Yeah, just like I’m gonna own you!” Catra charged forward, raising her saber above her head before bringing it down on Adora. She barely had time to respond, lifting her own saber to block it as she sunk down to her knee.

“Hey, I just ordered our table! It’ll be ready in a couple minutes,” Scorpia said as she came out the door in time to see Adora stand and knock Catra away from her. “What are you guys doing?”

Catra held Adora in a parry as she turned around to yell, “Fighting, duh!”

“Yeah, we see that!” Bow shouted as Adora brought her sword back to her chest, making Catra stumble as they slowly moved away from her car. “Why are you guys mad?”

“Not real fighting!” Adora answered, moving in closer to Catra as their sabers met in the middle time and time again. “I’m defending my honor and rights!”

“Yeah, her rights to dance with me instead of fighting in a parking lot!” Catra responded.

Adora faltered at that. Before she could begin overthinking what that meant in the middle of a lightsaber duel in the Denny's parking lot with the entire cast of Les Mis watching, Catra caught her saber and twisted her arm, causing Adora to completely let go of her saber.

“Not yet!” She dropped down low, catching the saber by the hilt before it hit the ground. She brought her blade back up, the two of them getting caught in another round of aimlessly swinging and blocking.

"You guys are ridiculous!" Glimmer shouted, her head in her hands.

"You don't appreciate the true art of Star Wars like we do!" Adora yelled back.

Truthfully, this isn't how she expected her last post closing night dinner at Denny's to go.

When she was talking about it to Catra on their way to school, they imagined a tearful night. Majority of the cast and crew were seniors, and everyone loved them. Glimmer had basically adopted a little sophomore, Frosta, who played Gavroche (no one even noticed the genderbend!). They all thought they were going to be sad, and cry in the back of Scorpia's pick up truck as they sang One Day More as a cast, one last time.

Instead, Adora was sword fighting Catra in the parking lot as all of their friends watched.

A great conclusion to her senior year musical, honestly.

Adora stood in front of Catra for a moment as they caught their breath. In an instant, they started twirling their sabers in their hands. The light from the blue and red was a whirlwind, and Catra laughed as they recreated that one scene from their favorite Star Wars movie: Revenge of the Sith.

Catra's laugh was intoxicating. It made Adora let out her own giggle. They went back to fighting after a second, but Catra's face illuminated by the red light in the nighttime made her stomach go up in butterflies.

"You were supposed to join me, not leave me in darkness!" Catra recited, smiling the whole time.

Adora swiped the saber at her feet, and Catra hopped over it. "Well, I love you!"

She froze, and Catra even faltered. But because she froze, Catra pushed her onto her back, pointing the red saber at her. "I know!"

For a moment, she forgot it was a reference to another one of the movies. But Adora let her saber fall out of her hand, looking up at Catra. The red light was stunning. Everyone else around them had fallen silent to watch the exchange. She then realized no one else knew what the reference was from.

"Guys, it's from one of the movies!" Adora called out from her place on the ground. "Empire Strikes Back, it's pretty good. You guys should watch it!"

Catra panted, looking down at her. "What?"

She was equally as confused. "What? What happened?"

"Oh, forget it." Catra turned off the saber, holding her hand out instead. "Want to rule a galaxy together instead?"

"How about we start by taking over Broadway," Adora grinned, helping herself up with Catra's assistance. She turned off the blue saber, but they continued to stare at each other. Catra continued to hold her hand, but neither made any attempt to move away.

"Did we just hash everything out in a Denny's parking lot?" Catra asked.

"I think we did.."

"Adora!" Glimmer shouted, interrupting their staring contest. "So like, I have a hundred with me. Bow has a twenty, but…"

The bet. A hundred and twenty dollars if she successfully asked her crush out to Princess Prom and didn't get rejected. But they just beat each other up with plastic toys from the Disney store. Maybe it just wasn't meant to be. Or maybe they were, but then one of them would fall to the dark side and tragically die. Who knows?

"Oh, that thing where Glimmer and Bow were going to give you money if you asked me to Princess Prom?" Catra raised an eyebrow, laughing at Adora's horrified face. "Bow told Scorpia, and she accidentally let it slip."

Adora groaned. She wanted to go fall in a hole and die in a ditch. Maybe she should've been shot on stage instead of Catra. "Yeah, about that-"

"I've been waiting for you to ask me," Catra said, tightening her hold on her hand. "I didn't think I wanted to go, but then I heard that and I realized… maybe I did. The dances and stuff always felt really corporate to me, and it wasn't my thing. But I went home everyday wondering why you hadn't asked me yet, and then I realized-"

"Oh my god I am so sorry," Adora interrupted. She was horrified. Catra knew the entire time. She's been tripping over herself for the two months of rehearsal and three weeks of the actual production, but never stopped to think what if she already knew. She's absolutely mortified. "You got dragged into this mess of a joke between me and Glimmer then Bow came in and I just thought, I don't know. I don't think or I think too much. Oh my god, I can not believe this is happening!"

Catra chuckled when she spoke without a pause. "Breathe. I'm not mad. Or upset or anything like that. I like you too, Adora."

Her cheeks flamed. "You did?"

She nodded. "You're not exactly subtle, per say…"

Adora didn't feel like crying out of embarrassment anymore. She put her free hand in her pocket, ghosting her fingers over Catra's knuckles with the other. "You actually like me?"

Another nod, accompanied with a gorgeous laugh. "Yes. Yes, I like you and all your high notes. You think I liked seeing you kiss Sea Hawk every rehearsal and show?" They both laughed. Neither of them like it, apparently, because Adora didn't. "You and your private story where you rewatch Clone Wars with me and we both cry, and I get to see the video and laugh at how oblivious you were to notice that I liked you. You and your bootleg pirating, despite the fact that Newsies is your favorite and it's literally proshot. So yeah, Adora. I do like you. You and your overthinking."

Adora was over the moon, and she wanted to stay here in the parking lot all night and talk. But first, she had something to conclude. "So, Princess Prom. That's a thing we should go to together."

"We should."

They did.

End Notes

If you think modern theatre kid Adora wouldn't overthink everything you're lying to yourself because as a theatre kid I can tell you all we do is cry about Jeremy Jordan and overthink.

I actually really like this one. Like this is my favorite thing I've written this whole series/week. I'm proud of this, surprisingly.
