Summary

Adora and Catra clean up their new room. (Catradora, Canon, Fluff)

Notes

Adora and Catra had always been used to cleaning up after themselves. While they were cadets in the Horde, it was always mandatory for them, along with the other kids, to clean the barracks every week, as well as their own bunks. Shadow Weaver always liked to claim it taught them discipline.

But despite having always hated cleaning up back then, at least now they were doing cleaning that they were actually feeling proud of. Since the rebels had abandoned Brightmoon in the months since Prime's invasion, the castle and Adora's room in particular had been left in quite a state of neglect.

Now though, the room was just about spotless clean. All the cobwebs and other dirt had been dusted away, what was broken had been repaired and thankfully for Adora's sanity, all of her stuff was organised and in the right places. Because Stars, that was driving Adora up the wall.

And so came the final job, the bed, or rather the new bed. After all, Adora and Catra were sharing a room and while they probably could have easily slept on Adora's old bed just fine… Glimmer had insisted they get something a little bigger, so she had lent them the bed from her mother's room.

As Adora carried the very large bed into place with her She-Ra form, she planted it down. Catra let out a little whistle when she saw the immense size of their new bed. "That's uh… quite a big bed."

"Well, Queen Angella was pretty tall… not to mention those wings of hers," Adora admitted. "Heck, I'm fairly sure she was even taller than me as She-Ra."

"And yet, Sparkles still got the short gene," Catra giggled, before she quickly dusted off the mattress before looking it over, her hands on her hips. "Well, at least we have plenty of space for Melog to cuddle with us."

Relieved that the job was over, she let out a yawn while doing a big stretch. Adora smirked, transforming back to her regular form and folding her arms, her signature smug face on full display. "Tired already?"

"In your dreams, Princess," Catra denied, though it was obvious she was barely standing on her own two feet. "Fine, maybe that stupid soft bed is looking pretty good right now."

"Then let me give you a hand!" Adora said with a grin, before grabbing Catra and scooping her into her arms.

Her girlfriend yelped, blushing for a moment at the fact that Adora was strong enough to just… do that… whenever she wanted. Was she really that light? She threw her arms around Adora's neck, giggling a little. "Adora!"

Her girlfriend just carried her towards the bed without breaking a sweat. She didn't even need She-Ra's powers to pick Catra up. Her smirk grew the more she saw the way Catra held onto her, flustered in her muscular arms. If she could, she would carry Catra in them all day.

"Don't worry, I won't drop you," she playfully said.

"I don't trust you, dummy," Catra teased. "You're the clumsiest dork this side of Etheria."

"Oh really?" the blonde huffed as they reached the bed, holding Catra up into the air. "We'll see about that."

Catra's eyes widened. "Adora, wait, no-". But her protests were too late as Adora just dropped Catra onto the bed with a thump. As Catra grumbled, she laughed, before looking back up at her girlfriend, still with that smug look on her face. "I'm gonna get you back for that, idiot!"

Adora just giggled, as Catra threw her arms around her shoulders and dragged her down onto the bed. The blonde gave in, as Catra flipped her over onto her back so she was lying on top of her. By the time the laughing had faded, Catra's head was lying on Adora's chest, the catgirl softly purring.

Pulling Catra close with her arm, Adora felt Catra curl up close to her. There were barely any sounds in the world other than the gentle breeze from outside, Adora and Catra's breathing and of course, Catra's purring. Other than that, everything was quiet, everything was peaceful.

It was at times like this that if someone arrived on Etheria right at that moment, they would never know that a war was being fought just a few days ago. A war with the fate of the universe itself at stake. Adora was still so tired from it all, probably would take both her and Catra weeks to fully recover.

But they had all the time in the universe now, no pressing matters to attend to. The others had gladly given the two their space for the moment while they dealt with repairing the castle and cleaning up. Adora relaxed with Catra in her arms… her Catra. Her girlfriend. The love of her life.

Just the fact that Catra was really her girlfriend and that this wasn't yet another dream… put years on Adora's lifespan.

As she looked to the side, she could see rays of warm sunlight shine through the window and open balcony, falling onto the walls of the room. For a moment, Adora thought she could see small particles of dust glistening around them. But of course, what she was still thinking about was her vision from when she'd almost died at the Heart.

As Adora hummed as her body relaxed, letting all the tension out of her body, Catra noticed the blonde idly gazing. "What are you looking at?"

"I'm looking at what's going to be over there," Adora sighed dreamily. "Me in a pretty white dress… you in a dashing red suit with a cape, like the most handsome prince."

Catra rolled her eyes. “You’re still going on about that stupid vision you had?”

“Well, it was of us being married,” Adora teased.

“It was also of me wearing shoes, so I’d say it was completely inaccurate.”

Adora giggled. “I don’t know… I thought you looked perfect. A ponytail would look amazing on you.”

Her girlfriend blushed and ruffled her currently very short hair. “Yeah well… maybe when this finally starts growing back.” She pressed her head on Adora’s chest more, purring softly. “But maybe stop thinking about the future too much, okay dummy? We just got done with saving the universe… no need to rush into anything.”

“You’re right,” Adora agreed, stroking Catra’s hair and planting a kiss on her cheek. Catra then went on the initiative and grabbed Adora’s cheeks, kissing her deeply. Adora blushed from the sudden kiss, before quickly kissing back, letting out a little sigh as she let Catra kiss her.

That was something… she definitely still needed to get used to. She’d never been kissed by anyone before Catra and every time Catra had kissed her, Adora was always taken aback. She held Catra, letting the felid’s soft lips keep pressing against her own, allowing herself to have this.

Catra tried to pull away from the kissing after a few moments, but Adora yanked her back in, kissing her hard and deep. She wasn’t going to let Catra get away from kissing her that easily. The felid let out a little squeak, before she wrapped her arms around Adora tightly, clinging onto her.

When they finally broke for air, Catra pressed her forehead against Adora’s, purring loudly. “Stars, I love you so much.”

“I love you more.”

“That’s impossible, I did the math in my head.”

Adora giggled, snuggling Catra. “Wanna stay here for a while?”

“Not like anything else is going to happen today,” Catra purred, nuzzling Adora’s face.

The two of them relaxed into one another, holding each other close. As they did so, Catra’s fingers traced circles on Adora’s skin, relishing in the fact that Adora was really here and in this room, they could both be safe. To the women who had saved the whole universe, this was the best reward of all.
