A Word Meaning Destiny

by Princess_Cyra

Summary

Would things have been the same if she'd never shown up, or if Adora hadn't been with the horde? Would the outcome still be the same? Would they still end up together like this, tangled together under the blankets, their love the reason the entire planet is bursting with life?

She tried not to go down the rabbit hole back during the war, because the very thought of not meeting Adora, even if only ever lead her to heartbreak, was too much. Despite everything, Adora was still important to her, even if she didn't want to admit it. Their memories together were precious, and Catra was willing to go through her suffering apart from Adora if it meant she'd get their childhood together. She would've never voiced it out loud, she didn't even want to accept that truth, but deep down, she knew it was true.

(OR)

Fate is weird. Sometimes you quite literally stumble into the most important relationship of your life.

Notes

I've gone off writing for a while because of some personal reasons, let's just say that the ao3 author curse got me :"D. anyway here have a one-shot I wrote in three hours.

See the end of the work for more notes

It was a quiet night. Moonlight spilled in through the curtains, illuminating the dark room and the young, blonde woman sleeping peacefully on the bed. Adora had been tasked with carrying building supplies over in Plumeria that day, while Catra was placed in the comfort of Brightmoon Palace to assist Glimmer as her Royal Advisor. The blonde hadn't returned to the place until ten in the night, and she didn't even bother taking a shower before she collapsed beside Catra and fell asleep.

She had her head on Catra's chest, and the brunette admired how the moonlight made her soft skin and beautiful hair glow like she was a divine being. Even during the night, Adora never failed to take the brunette's breath away.

Melog was napping on Adora's other side, trapping the blonde in the middle so that she wouldn't tumble down during the middle of night when Catra was fast asleep and in no position to help. Catra wasn't tired, she'd slept all throughout the afternoon because she didn't have a lot of work to do, so it would take some time for her to fall asleep. She wasn't complaining, not when she had free reign to admire her girlfriend's beauty as she slept, without any worry about being caught.

Catra pressed a kiss to Adora's hair, purring louder as she gave her sleeping girlfriend an affectionate smile. Adora was a hard, dedicated worker, with so much kindness and love that it overflowed out to everyone in the world. It was one of the things that drew Catra to her in the first place, because as much as acted like she was hardened and tough, deep down she was just as sappy as Adora was. She loved Adora's kind soul, her goofy, energetic personality that drew everyone in like a magnet, and after everything Catra had done, she felt honored that the blonde trusted her with her heart.

She didn't feel like she deserved it, and sometimes she felt like Adora would realise it and leave her. Catra wouldn't blame her, she was shocked that Adora felt as passionately for her as Catra did. She was thankful for it, yes, but sometimes Catra felt like she deserved better. She felt broken, she felt like she was too much, she had too much baggage and Adora wouldn't be able to handle it anymore. Yet, she still returned to Catra's side every night, still thought she was the most beautiful woman she'd ever laid eyes on.

It was nice, Catra wouldn't trade it for anything in the world, but she would die on the hill that Adora was the most beautiful woman in the world.

Adora shifted, humming a little and pressing her face against Catra's neck. The brunette's ears perked up, looking over at her girlfriend who was stirring from her deep sleep for some unknown reason.

"Catra…?" Adora mumbled quietly, rubbing her cheek against the brunette, even though she couldn't scent mark the way Catra could.

"Go back to sleep." Catra replied, pressing her forehead against Adora's.

"Why aren't you asleep?" The blonde asked, hugging Catra tighter and raising her hand clumsily to pet her ears. The brunette smiled and leaned into it, feeling the contentment coming from Melog as well from the affection.

"I took a long nap in the afternoon, I'm not sleepy." Adora hummed in response to that, eventually pulling her hand away in favor of rubbing her cheek against Catra's neck.

The brunette had never noticed how Adora often mirrored her, rubbing her face the way Catra did when scent marking, humming along when she began to purr. When the blonde was younger, she would even hiss at people, but Weaver trained that out of her. It wasn't until Catra came back to Brightmoon that she noticed it, and it warmed something in her to know that she'd left an imprint herself on her girlfriend. It made their distance during the war feel like a lot less.

Would things have been the same if she'd never shown up, or if Adora hadn't been with the horde? Would the outcome still be the same? Would they still end up together like this, tangled together under the blankets, their love the reason the entire planet is bursting with life?

She tried not to go down the rabbit hole back during the war, because the very thought of not meeting Adora, even if only ever lead her to heartbreak, was too much. Despite everything, Adora was still important to her, even if she didn't want to admit it. Their memories together were precious, and Catra was willing to go through her suffering apart from Adora if it meant she'd get their childhood together. She would've never voiced it out loud, she didn't even want to accept that truth, but deep down, she knew it was true.

"Hey…" Adora mumbled, lifting her head to look at Catra properly. She was more awake now, her gaze much more clear, and entirely focused on Catra. The brunette always loved Adora's attention, she did nearly everything back during the war to have the blonde's focus on her. It didn't matter if it wasn't positive, all she wanted was to be her sole focus. She still couldn't believe that she could have Adora's focus on her whenever she wanted for the rest of her life.

"Are you okay? What are you thinking about?" She asked gently, her smile enough to light up Catra's life. Goodness, she was so gone for her.

"Nothing, don't worry about it." Catra replied easily, moving Adora's bangs out of her face so that she could press a kiss to her forehead.

"Now I'm even more curious." Adora said with a grin, adjusting herself so that they were facing each other. "Tell me."

It was a request, she could still deny and Adora would let it go and they would talk about something else. Catra didn't want to talk about something else though.

“Have you ever thought about the fact that us meeting was basically fate?” Catra whispered, looking away as her tail swayed nervously behind her.

“What do you mean?” Adora asked, tilting her head curiously.

“You found me in that box, but honestly it’s was just a coincidence that you’d sneaked into that room and opened that particular box because you heard noises from it.” She shook her head, groaning a little. “Goodness I am not explaining it properly.”

“Take your time. I’m not going anywhere.” She gently took Catra’s hand, rubbing circles into her palms while waiting patiently for her to gather her thoughts.

It took a few minutes for Catra to start speaking again. Melog again woke up during this time, their tail wagging when they noticed that Adora had also woken up. They shoved their head into Adora’s hands, growling expectantly while the blonde giggled and dug her nails into Melog’s head.

“I was just saying that our lives could’ve gone so much more differently. I mean, you could’ve just not shown up at the loading bay when that force captain brought me in that box… Weaver could’ve found me and had no reason to keep me, and I would be dead. Or I could’ve escaped from that Horde Raid and never made it to the Fright Zone… if I had a family I would’ve stayed with them.” Catra explained, squeezing Adora’s hand tightly. “We had so much opportunity to not meet, but we still did.”

Adora paused, looking thoughtful about what Catra had said, still petting Melog as she really thought about the course of their lives.

“Yeah.. I get it, what you’re saying.” Adora replied, leaning back against Catra pulling the hand that was squeezing Catra’s to wrap it around her waist.

“It’s like our whole relationship started because of one happy coincidence. You stumbled into the loading bay by accident, and it was just a coincidence that I’d been brought to the horde that day, and it led us to each other." She went on, rubbing her cheek against Adora's shoulders.

She could hear soft footsteps outside. Her ears perked up, claws scratching against the box, a loud mewl escaping her as she tried to signal to whoever was outside that she was in there. She needed to escape, she needed to get out, this was her chance.

The footsteps stopped, whoever was in the room could hear her in the box.

"Hello?" A high pitched voice called out. She mewled louder, scratching harder against the box. The footsteps grew louder as the person ran over to her box, stopping just in front of it. For a second nothing happened. She went silent as she waited for something to happen, but as the minutes went on, she wondered if the person had left and she'd been too distracted to notice.

She was wrong. The box opened, dim light spilled into it, making her hiss. A face peeked into the box, the little girl was no older than she was. She lit up at the sight of her, her bright blue eyes shining almost unnaturally like she was an angel.

That was what she was, an angel.

"I wouldn't do it differently." Adora admitted with a shrug, pressing her face against Catra's hair. "I would do everything again, even the war, if it meant we could have this."

She purred in response, flushing at Adora's words. She turned in the blonde's arms and grabbed her shirt to pull her down for a soft kiss so that she cover up how flustered she was. Adora couldn't just say shit like that, it wasn't responsible. She was going to die from a heart attack before thirty. Did it matter that Catra shared the sentiment? No, because voicing it out loud was something different.

They fell silent after that, relishing in each other's presence while taking turns petting Melog so that they didn't feel left out. It had been a busy week, they didn't get a lot of time together, so this was a nice way to end the trying day.

It was Catra who broke the silence once more.

"Do you think that if we'd have never met in the loading bay that day, if I'd never come to the Fright Zone, we would've still met? Still ended up together?" She asked, looking up at Adora with curious eyes, waiting for her partner to answer.

It took Adora a lot longer to answer this time, her eyes growing distant as she glanced down at Melog, petting the massive cat as she tried to figure out her answer. Catra waited patiently, playing with the blanket while purring quietly.

"Yeah. I think we would've met somehow." Adora eventually said. "We're soulmates, we would've found our way to each other."

Catra blushed darker than before, hiding her face in Adora's shoulder. "Soulmates? Goodness, princess. You're so sappy."

Adora giggled, her cheeks also flushing as she turned around to face Catra with a look, like words simply couldn't convey how deep her feelings for the brunette were.

"You were the one who started this conversation! I'm simply matching your energy." The blonde teased, ruffling Catra's hair, making her hiss and swat her hand away.

"Yeah, yeah whatever." She whispered like she was annoyed, but the smile on her face said otherwise.

Adora's face fell, her entire being reeking of worry. Catra noticed that she'd began fildding with the bedsheet. She immediately knew something was wrong.

"What's wrong, princess?" She whispered, nudging her hair against Adora's neck.

“Nothing.” Adora lied, smiling nervously like she wasn’t the world’s most unconvincing liar.

“Yeah right. Spill. What’s wrong?” Catra asked again with an eye roll.

Adora didn’t respond for a moment, looking away as though facing the brunette as she explained what was wrong was simply too much.

“Would you- Would you have wanted us to meet eventually? I mean, we both know how much pain we’d been through. Would you have done it again?”

Goodness, Catra really was in love with a moron.

She shook her head, laughing softly before pulling Adora in for another kiss. The blonde melted into it, but pulled away pretty quickly like she was expecting an answer.

“Adora, of course I would’ve. I can’t imagine my life without you, dummy!” She answered with a grin, matching Adora’s affectionate look almost exactly. “I think we would’ve always found each other, our love saved the universe for a reason, don’t you think?”

Adora giggled, leaning back against Catra. “Yeah it did. Guess we were meant to always be together, even at the end of everything.”

“Yeah…” Catra agreed. “We were.”

They fell into a comfortable silence after that. Catra yawned, her tail swaying behind her. Adora mumbled that they ought to get some rest, they’d had long days (long lives, honestly) and deserved the rest. They pulled the blanket over themself, Catra tucked against Adora’s chest while the blonde hugged her so tight, gentle reassurance for the both of them that neither was going to let go. Not again.

Right before they went to sleep, Adora broke the silence for one last time.

“Hey… Catra?”

“Yeah?”

“I’m glad I met you that night, in the loading bay.”

Catra didn’t say anything for a minute, she was too sleepy to process the words entirely. When she did, she purred and pressed a kiss to Adora’s shoulders.

“Me too, princess.”

She fell asleep peacefully, knowing that they were together in every other universe, and even if they weren’t, she knew that she’d always find her way to Adora. They were soulmates, after all, their lives forever linked.

Maybe it was sappy, but it was true.

End Notes

This is a gift for my friend Red Squiggles. You're one of the most important people in my life, and im so glad that fate led me to you two years ago. Hope you enjoyed this quick one-shot I whipped up.
