Getaway Car

by stochasticmercy

Summary

Old fic in a mafia AU where Force Captain Adora and her team of agents from the Horde gang execute a heist to steal the Runestones against their enemies, the Princess Alliance. Catra and Adora can't seem to take a break from the flirting, even on the mission. Catra's POV. Enjoy!

The early autumn breeze slips through the cracks of the windows and dissolves in the tension in the car. Now that Adora is a force captain, they arranged a mission for her by herself, but after some convincing, they let me join her. She's quietly tapping her foot as we drive in the brand new, untouched car.

It's hardly as impressive as the ones we usually go in; the headlights aren't as bright as they pierce through the night, and the seats aren't big enough. Otherwise, I'd be sitting in her lap just to tease her while she tries to focus on the road. She carefully peers as she continues to follow the speed limit on an empty road. It's hilarious watching her follow traffic laws.

"Are you ready for this?" I look at her carefully, and she taps the steering wheel rapidly with her thumbs as she takes a turn.

"I-I hope so." She sighs and looks over at me, her confidence wavering. "It's just weird, not having the crew. They usually make the drive seem less...scary." She mumbles and looks at me before quickly turning back.

Kyle, Rogelio, and Lonnie are usually in the backseat (I scratch anyone who wants to be shotgun), and our banter to the location is always hilarious, yet I'm offended Adora thinks I'm not enough company for her. I poke her cheek and giggle at her reaction.

"Stop being so nervous, you're gonna make me nervous! This mission will go fine, Adora." I tell her, stating the obvious. She's one of the best members of the Horde, and even our Boss, Hordak, loves her. "Where did all your confidence go?"

She slows down and smiles sheepishly. "You're right, we got this."

I roll my eyes while crossing my arms in front of my chest. "Exactly, don't scare me like that! It must be easy getting lost in your head though, I mean, look at the size of that forehead-"

She gasps dramatically, and her offended face is hilarious. She scoffs, and we both burst into laughter. She takes a turn into the unlit parking lot and casually parks towards the side of it. We roll up all the windows, and Adora takes out two incredibly small earpieces from a small envelope. After slipping one into her ear, she hands me the other.

We step out of the car and head past the parking lot, our steps seeming unwelcome as they disturb the silence. The street is darkened by shadows, so the visibility isn't high- that will work towards our advantage when we're returning. We continue down the street, and I turn on the earpiece, the status running before I hear Entrapta's nasal voice.

"The security has been breached, the cameras are off!" I can hear her spinning around in her chair, and I nod, looking back at Adora.

"Thanks- we're almost there. See ya, Dryl."

We have codenames when we're on missions, so we don't use our real names and expose valuable information about our jobs and positions. Adora frequently changes hers because she's 'creative.' For now, she's Darling because Hordak called her one, and since she's so proud of herself, she changed her codename.

"Who are you talking to?" She asks me, ponytail running through the wind as she catches up with me. "Dryl's not with us…" She questions; she looks like a lost puppy. I giggle and roll my eyes as I tuck the loose strand behind her ear and cup her face.

"Well, Darling…" I smirk at the way my voice deepens as I almost whisper into her ear, getting on my tippy-toes to see her and tilt her face down slightly. "Maybe if you turned this on, you would hear her," I say quietly into her ear. I don't want anyone to overhear us.

"OH- wow-" I do it for her and hear the static quietly before it fades out, and she looks down at me suddenly. "You're really close to my face, haha." She awkwardly laughs, and I push her away and hurry again.

“We sleep in the same bed, you dork.” I laugh and look back at her. “Did you hit your head, force captain?” I tease her, and watch her face darken as she scoffs.

“What-no!” She shakes her head, and we near the lonesome building. “Applesauce…” Her smile is so promising, and her eyes shine as they glance over at me. “Good luck to us, remember the plan!” She whispers and shoots her grappling hook at the cracked open and begins to climb the back of the building. I give her a reassuring nod, and we slip inside from the treasury.

Our rival gang, the Princess Alliance, was having a meeting in one of their headquarters. So apart from basic security checks, we wouldn’t have to worry about encountering any potential threats. At least not yet.

The Princesses had acquired a set of jewels. They weren’t really important to us, but Entrapta insisted they would help us with technological advancements. Hordak supports her because ever since she’s taken over that group, the Horde has been able to create impressive new weapons and machinery.

Our job is to find the blueprints, ideas, and anything affiliated with these ‘Runestones’ as she calls them. The layout of the building isn’t too complicated (perhaps it might be for Adora) as I make my way to the planning room.

Adora was after the stones themselves. I was here to assist her and pick anything else I could. Our steps were inaudible; after training for stealth and strength, it would make sense. They had their files under a heavy lock, and it took us a while to find the key (which was in Angella’s pillowcase).

“I’ll take the papers from these; you go find the Runestones.” My voice is nothing more than a whisper, and I’m almost afraid she won’t be able to hear me. But luckily, she nods, and she quietly slips away from me as I brush through the files in the drawer, running through each folder for anything important.

They have papers from years ago, and I almost gasp seeing the dates written on these. They have all these strategies, lists of members, the losses and wins. I only take a few; I don't want to make it too obvious that I looked through the drawer. There are a few papers on the research of the runestones and the Princesses being able to access them. I carefully hold onto them and return the files, straightening them before slipping them back.

We're not supposed to walk with too much stuff; there's a risk of dropping it or leaving behind any personal evidence. I only have a small pouch that slips into my pocket easily, and the papers have been folded up into it. If this were at a familiar location, I'd make copies of it so we couldn't even need the original, but I don't think we'll have time for that.

Once I'm satisfied after looking through the papers, I lock the drawer again and remove all the traces of my presence in the room, before checking the hall. Once it's empty, I slip out of the room and click the earpiece. "Dryl," I whisper once I enter the empty room in a corner. "Can you give me my Darling's location?"

"Sure, give me a second."

"She's on the same floor as you, walk across and take a left. Good luck." Her voice dissolves in static, and I sigh. The room is a bit warm and humid, and I try to forget about the discomfort and slip past the guards and enter the room. I find her carrying several items in her arms, and she quickly turns to look at me.

"There you are, Applesauce."

"You know, that's not even my real code-name."

"I like Applesauce more. What did you find?" She questions me curiously, and I slip out the packet of papers and hand them to her.

"Enough information to be useful. What about you?" I take it back from her and tuck it safely into my pocket and stare at her, "Why are you carrying all of that?!" I almost shriek, noticing it again. There's no way we won't get caught with all of that junk.

"Oh- this is important! I can't decide which ones are the right stones, and which ones are just copies, though." She lays them across the bed and scatters them far enough for me to see each of them individually.

"...I looked in Bow's room, I know he's like the technician or something. And Angella's, since she's the boss. Sparkles had some stuff too." Sparkles is my nickname for Glimmer, and I smirk when I hear Adora use it. Regardless, she took days to plan this all out and many sleepless nights perfecting this mission so it would go smoothly. I'm glad her work paid off.

"Dryl gave us a tube, we just need to pour some on each stone-"

"And whichever ones don't react are real!" Adora interrupts with an excited smile. She's such a dork, I smile to myself and hand her the bottled test-tube. I lean against the wall. She pours some of the translucent liquid upon all of the stones; there are about a dozen of them.

She steps back, wipes some sweat off her forehead, her face is tinted red, and her long ponytail falls down her shoulder. I subconsciously fix my hair as I stare at her, looking practically flawless under the moonlight. "I think it's working."

I look into her eyes, and I don't want to pull away, but I force myself to look down at the stones. Some of the crystals begin to bubble and tear apart, the acid slips into the rough surfaces, and their colors fade into powdery ashes.

Adora tries to scoop them off the bed and yelps, It's a bit too loud for my own liking, "Shh!" I frantically whisper, and she's flailing her hands. "Please, Darling, be quieter." I take the two crystals that are originals.

"It BURNS!" She exclaims, her whisper being harsh.

“That’s why you don’t touch objects torn by acid!” I scold her, taking her hand to examine it. “We have a first-aid kit in our car, just hang on tight for a little bit longer,” I assure her, and look at her, smirking at me.

“Wh-what do you want?”

“You know what I want.”

I groan quietly and roll my eyes. “I’m not doing it.”

“But Applesauce...you have to.”

“We did this as kids, Darling. I don’t need to kiss you every time you get hurt.”

But I still take her long fingers and kiss the back of her hand, and I see her giggling above me. “Ya know, my cheek hurts too.”

“Yeah, it will hurt more once I punch it.” I snap, and she covers her mouth to stifle her laughter. I scoop the fake crystals and bag them to throw out later, grasping on to the real crystals in my other hand. “C’mon, is it time to go yet?”

“Nope, last step. We just need to remove any trace of us being here.” She begins to tidy up the room and I look down at the Runestones. The first one is the size of my palm, to simply put it, it’s a light blue. It’s the shade of a light, summery day, and it’s mesmerizing to stare at. The other one is much darker, a black, bloodstained color. It glows in a pitch-black ruby shade. I tightly hold it into my hands.

“Are you ready, love?” she nods affirmatively, we make sure each room we entered was the same as it was before and we find the backside window we came in from. The curtains sway with the wind as we slip back the way we came, using the grappling hook and aiming at the tree’s that stalk the building.

“Ya know, I like this. You’ve been calling me ‘Darling’ all night.”

“I’m going to hit you.”

“AAAH-NO I’M JUST KIDDING APPLESAUCE-”

“Shut up, you can yell once we’re in the car.” I remind her as we leave the vicinity of the building. “Oh, Dryl, you can stop unlooping the camera. We’ve left the proximity.” I turn off the earpiece as we quietly return to the van. Our steps fade into the wind and although I love the echo of the heels, I’m trying to remain as silent as the creatures crawling through the cracks of the sidewalk. One of them is a small beetle, rolling against the rough surface.

I hurry past it and enter the empty parking lot, underneath the flickering lights that stochastically blink as we slip into the car. “Darling, I’m going to be driving.” I hiss as I push her into the passenger seat.

“We’re not on the mission anymore, you don't have to call me that. Unless you want to-” I take the jewels and shove them into the bag, and steal the keys from her playful grip.

“Shut up, now take out the kit and deal with your burn.” She looks down at her hands, surprised.

“I forgot about that!”

“Of course you did.”

I take off in the getaway car, wavering above the speed limit as I follow the lights back to the Fright Zone. Overall, I think we did fairly well with the mission, after a few days we will probably have agents come back with duplicates of everything so we’re not under suspicion.

“So, Adora, I think we did great.” I try to fill up the silence.

“I know we did, Hordak will be so proud of you.” She stares at the jewels and holds them up against the light.

“He’ll just love you more. Good job, Force Captain.” I look away, leaning away from her. I knew this would happen, all the credit goes to her. Not that I really mind, but sometimes I just wish they’d treat me a little bit nicer because of my effort to the group.

“Catra, I’m going to make sure they give you as much credit as me. I promise.”

“You promise?”

She leans over to wrap her arms around me and her lips brush against my cheek, and my fingers linger over the skin when she pulls away. “I promise.”
