Battle for the Tungsten Throne

by Madgirlmuahaha

After formally announcing their engagement and Entrapta's impending coronation, a figure from her past shows up to challenge her claim to the throne.

A New Challenger Approaches!

Hordak lurked outside of the robotics lab, anxiously fiddling with the little metal band that formally marked his betrothal to one Princess Entrapta of Dryl. His fiancé was busy at work on the other side of the locked door, drilling and hammering away in a raucous symphony for the eleventh day in a row.

The engineering frenzy had been instigated at the formal announcement of their engagement. The two lab partners had their own little celebration with their friends beforehand, but this was a political affair: a luncheon hosted with the Drylian council to discuss the finer legal and political details of the impending nuptials.

To nobody's surprise, several of the council members were wary (if not outright hostile) toward the disgraced former Lord of the Horde being inaugurated as Drylian royalty, but most of them had the good sense to avoid any outright insults or accusations, likely dissuaded by the presence of other royals. Mermista and Glimmer had been present to show their support for the happy couple, and few people dared to openly challenge their judgment.

Things had been going as well as could be expected. Hordak fielded invasive and uncomfortable questions thrown his way, politely avoiding the worst ones by occupying himself with tiny sandwiches and miniature quiches and doing his best to suppress murderous glares. Yes, Entrapta was in full possession of her mental faculties; No, this was not a power grab to reinstate the Etherian Horde; and kindly piss off, because the specifics regarding their very healthy sex life was of no importance to anybody else.

The only thing stopping him from losing his newly-cultivated patience was the feeling of Entrapta's hair curled soothingly around his wrist, and the steady supply of tiny tomato sandwiches.

There had been one figure who had refrained from engaging: a short, stocky man introduced as Sir Trigger, the younger brother of Entrapta's organic mother who had been serving on the council in the absence of a queen. With his silence, he had been ranked in Hordak's mind as the most tolerable member of the council so far, though Trigger's steady, furrowed gaze trained on Hordak in a most unnerving manner.

The older man cleared his throat loudly, commanding silence from the other attendees. Trigger eased back in his chair, running a calloused hand through salt-and-pepper hair that was more salt than pepper under all the layers of coal dust from the mines. "I take it you're ready to go through with your coronation too, eh?"

Entrapta inhaled deeply, glancing wide-eyed at her partner for support before answering. "Um, yes. I know I haven't been the most consistent in engaging with royal affairs, but my people need me. All of them." A lock of hair fidgeted with her mask. "Not just the ones who were born here."

Anxious tittering erupted around the table. The treatment of ex-horde soldiers and clones was a sore subject, especially for the more conservative members of the council who disapproved of Entrapta's insistence on empathy and accommodation.

Uncle Trigger leapt onto the table, slamming down with his heavy work boots and standing tall over his niece. Hordak felt the loop of hair around his wrist tighten uncomfortably.

"Princess Entrapta of Dryl, I hereby challenge you to a duel for the Tungsten Throne. In two weeks' time, at the height of the glow-moon, in the Volcanic Coliseum." Trigger then jettisoned out of Crypto Castle on the rocket booster installed in his prosthetic right leg.

The whole room erupted into anarchy. It took every ounce of self-control in Hordak's body to not run after the man in sheer rage at the insult paid toward his beloved princess. Entrapta pulled him back to her side, grinned at him, and whispered that the spectacle was a great excuse to call the meeting over and kick everybody out.

Entrapta seemed a bit rattled by the whole thing, though that could just as easily be attributed to the stress of interacting with so many difficult people all at once. She seemed neither offended nor surprised by the actual challenge and reassured her partner that this was some sort of obscure Drylian tradition that he didn't have to worry about. He worried about it anyway, because as her fiancé, it was pretty much his legal responsibility to do so.

And thus, it began. Entrapta holed herself up in her lab, toiling away tirelessly in preparation for the duel. Hordak was locked out of the robotics lab. She charged him with snack duty and repaid him generously with kisses, but he was barred from assisting with this particular project. This was her responsibility, she insisted. She was a big girl, she could fight her own battles.

It wasn't that Hordak didn't trust in her abilities. He simply felt compelled to make himself useful, to prove himself worthy as future consort to the Queen of Dryl in whatever way he could. Public opinion would never be able to change the feelings they had toward each other and the powerful bond they'd cultivated over the years, but he still felt public pressure to prove himself as a man changed for the better and devoted to his Queen.

Three days before the deadline, Hordak knocked hesitantly on the robotics lab door and offered up a tray of miniature pancakes. Entrapta stumbled out of the lab, her eyes wild with unhinged glee and bloodshot from sleep deprivation. She ate the entire plate of pancakes in three seconds and collapsed into Hordak's arms.

"She's ready," Entrapta mumbled into his chest, and then she passed out. Hordak fought back the temptation to creep into the lab and sneak a peek at her newest creation, but opted instead to tuck his beautiful, brilliant lab partner into bed for a well-deserved forty straight hours of sleep.

The Volcanic Coliseum was an open, empty crater that had been created during the long-dormant mountain's last eruption six thousand years ago. The terrain still bore fissures and trails that had been carved into the rock from lava millenia ago. It was vast enough to accommodate hundreds of spectators, with plenty of room for snack stalls and souvenir stands, too.

As the glow-moon crept higher into the sky, more and more people flooded in to spectate on the duel. There were Drylian citizens, of course, and plenty of ex-Horde folks and clones still adjusting to civilian life and present to show their support for their future queen. Word had gotten out to other kingdoms about the impending duel, attracting a number of spectators who were here purely to indulge in the scandal of it all.

The other members of the Princess Alliance were in attendance, as well. All the other royal heads were led to a special roped-off corner specifically for visiting royalty, while the non-royals (Bow, Adora, Catra, and Sea Hawk) were charged with keeping Hordak company and preventing him from flying into a rage if anything happened to Entrapta.

"Hey, can we get you anything to eat?" Bow suggested, sitting down next to the sulking clone with a giant tub of popcorn. "They've got all kinds of festival foods set up around here."

Hordak eyed the oversized tub of butter and salt and scowled. "I appreciate your consideration, but I do not have much of an appetite, seeing as the love of my life is about to battle for her birthright and dignity against her own family."

"At least it's not a duel to the death," Catra offered unhelpfully, wincing as Adora elbowed her in the ribs. "Hey! I'm just saying–!"

Adora rolled her eyes and gave a sympathetic look toward Hordak. "It's alright to be worried, but Entrapta's tough. She's a fighter, nothing can stop her when she's really invested in something."

Of course Hordak knew that. Anybody who had spent more than ten minutes around Entrapta could tell that once her passion and attention was trained on something, almost nothing could stop her from pursuing it, ethics and laws be damned. Entrapta herself had reassured him over and over that she knew what she was doing here, she was fine doing it herself, she could fight her own battles.

But he also knew that she had spent years relying on herself and her own abilities out of necessity, just as he had spent far too many years alone. Entrapta's isolation on Beast Island had only aggravated her old self-isolating tendencies, too. Learning to fully trust each other and operate as partners both in and out of the lab was an ongoing process for both of them. They each had their moments of slipping back into old habits and reverting to the cycle of self-reliance to the point of self-destruction, but that was something they were trying to break free from, individually and as a couple.

He just wished that she didn't have to fight her own battles, on her own, all the time.

Sea Hawk appeared with armfuls of souvenirs just as the glow-moon reached its peak and the crowd started to rile up. "Hey, guys! Look at all the cool merch they have! Check this out!" He unraveled a dark gray t-shirt stamped with a nearly illegible font that Hordak had to tilt his head and squint to read.

THE MOST EXPLOSIVE EVENT IN DRYLIAN HISTORY

Crude stock images of fireballs framed low-resolution images of the dueling royals' faces. On the back of the shirt, the phrase TEAM TRIGGER was printed in the same obnoxious font as the rest of the text.

Adora groaned. "Seriously? We're supposed to be here to support Entrapta."

"Oh, they have ones for her, too!" Sea Hawk tossed out a couple of purple shirts that were identical to the gray one, but had TEAM ENTRAPTA stamped on the back instead. "I promised Mermista I'd get her one of everything while she's stuck in the royals box."

Hordak sighed wearily, but donned the purple tee anyway. Just another addition to his ever-growing collection of ugly and bizarrely specific graphic clothing items.

"Having fun?"

An irritating silky-smooth voice intoned from somewhere behind him. Hordak felt a finger run up the back of his neck and flinched away, turning to swipe at them, but they disappeared around the other side and popped back up down in front of him.

"Double Trouble," he growled.

"I wouldn't be a very good event planner if I didn't make sure the guest of honor was having a good time," they drawled, stretching out to lay across Catra and Sea Hawk's laps. "Though, funny that you're here, and all the other big wigs are over there ." Their thin reptilian tail pointed in the direction of the royals' box.

"This isn't about me. It's about Entrapta."

"Not about you?" They blinked incredulously. "Honey, you know it's not a happy little accident that this is all going down right before you crazy kids get hitched. She couldn't stop talking about you backstage." Their face morphed to copy Entrapta's. " I don't care about controversy, we love each other, and I'll do whatever it takes for us to be together!" Their face morphed back, smiling viciously at Hordak's wild blushing. "Feel free to quote me on that one, big boy."

"Don't you have anything better to do? Like spreading rumors about Glimmer?" Catra sniped, crossing her arms while they made themself at home invading her personal space.

They narrowed their eyes at her. "Meow-ch, kitten. As much as I love messing with Queen Sparkletits, I'd rather not risk getting kicked out of this gig. Oh! I've got one more juicy bit of gossip that I think you'll find delicious. You know Drylian dueling rules? Since jolly old Uncle Trigg chose the time and place, Entrapta got to pick the method of the duel." They leaned in conspiratorially, their eyes flashing dangerously. "Regrettably, I only caught a glimpse of the weapon she chose, but let me tell you: it's going to make for one hell of a show. Action, drama, scandal— buckle up, babes, this is the real deal."

With a wink and a flash of razor sharp teeth, they slinked away, leaving Hordak with a feeling of dread in his stomach.

She wasn't just dueling for the throne. She was dueling for him. He'd suspected that their impending union would stir up controversy, but figured that he would be the one who had to suffer with the bulk of the burden, not her. The realization made him feel even more useless and pathetic. He should be out there with her, fighting alongside her and proving his worth, not sitting here like a useless idiot.

Just as he was about to stand up and push his way over to the backstage area, loud, pounding music kicked up over the crowd. A massive, hulking clone took center stage, his face shining with pride and anticipation. A muscular arm rose up from under his bear pelt cloak, joyfully riling up the crowd for the spectacle unfolding in the coliseum.

"Citizens of Etheria! Are you READY TO RUMBLE?!!"

The crowd burst out in an ear-splitting wave of whoops and cheers in response.

Hordak recognized the clone as Rumble Roar, a peculiar character with an unmatched love for sport and competition. The larger clone puffed out his chest and gripped a handheld microphone, though his booming voice could be heard over the crowd regardless.

"Let's hear it for our challenger today! Surfacing from the depths of the Drylian mines, this powerhouse packs one hell of a punch behind a hair-trigger temper! Give it up for Sir TRIGGER!"

A deep, thundering rumble rolled across the coliseum, shaking the very ground as a hulking machine emerged onto the battle ring. Every surface of the contraption had a different instrument jutting out from it, everything from wrecking balls to gigantic drills to—was that a missile launcher?

"She may be old-school, but don't let all that rust fool you! Ol' Reliable here has been in operation for at least twenty years, and she'll keep standing for twenty more! Fifteen thousand pounds of Dryl's finest steelwork has made this baby indestructible!"

To show off Ol' Reliable's prowess, the drills revved up ominously. The crowd went wild.

"A mech fight?!" Bow gasped incredulously.

Catra's jaw dropped. "I shouldn't be surprised. I mean, it's Entrapta. But still! Holy shit!"

Hordak was not panicking. He was not panicking. Definitely not panicking. Don't panic don't panic don't panic don't panic don't —!! *Panic!!!

Rumble Roar basked in the frantic energy before screaming into the mic again.

"And now, for our defending champion: hailing from the great, dark mountains of Crypto Castle, legally banned from holding a driver's license in nine different Queendoms including her own, it's your number one heavy-hitting engineering super villain of all time, the Princess of Dryl herself, ENTRAPTAAA!!"

Cheers and howls exploded from the crowd just as the far corner of the ring exploded with lasers and smoke. A sleek purple mech hovered forth, a vaguely humanoid shape with "arms" and "legs" tapering into long, triangular prisms with rounded points barely grazing the ground. Two smaller triangular protrusions jutted from the head, almost like a cat's ears. Even from a distance, Hordak could recognize some of the external sensors and weaponry as upgraded and upscaled components from their old Horde bots.

A First One's crystal was inset proudly in the middle panel of the torso directly underneath the bot's head. Diamond-shaped just like Hordak's, and a bright, glowing red: his color. Anybody who didn't already know they were engaged probably knew it now.

"Here for her grand debut, let's give it up for Cynthia! Who knows what planet those metals are from?! There's no telling what tricks this little lady has up her sleeve!"

Cynthia's head swiveled around, scanning the crowd until it faced right toward Hordak. The left arm-appendage-thing raised up like it was waving at him, and he could imagine Entrapta's excited face peering out at him from behind the tinted heavy-duty plexiglass windshield.

"Two of the planet's finest engineers, here battling bot-to-bot for the Tungsten Throne in a duel for the ages!"

Rumble Roar reeled back and howled up at the glow-moon, loudly enough to force high-pitched shrieks from the microphone.

"LET'S GET RRRREADY TO RRRRRUMBLE!!"

The air horn sounded off, and both of the mechs swung into action.

Crowning Glory!

The bots fight!

The two bots clashed against each other in a glorious display of pure destruction and chaos. Metal shrapnel went flying, sparking and fragmenting through the air like fireworks. It was impossible to discern which battle-bot was doing what, as monstrous metal claws and spikes and armatures smashed together and broke from overwhelming force.

It was terrifying. It was beautiful. Hordak thought so, during the brief half-seconds when his appreciation for the spectacle outweighed his fear for his soon-to-be-wife's safety.

Any sense of awe was quickly extinguished when Ol' Reliable struck hard at Cynthia, sending it crashing down to the ground. Hordak stood in pure shock, but a firm hand on his shoulder prevented him from dashing down to the fighting ring himself.

"Look," Adora said, barely audible over the crowd's murmurs of anticipation.

Static hung thickly in the air. A fuzzy halo appeared around Cynthia, giving it an ethereal glow. The bot seemed like it was vibrating, shifting, moving, but without leaving its original position.

Suddenly, there were three Cynthias in the fighting ring, all standing side by side. Then five Cynthias. Then thirteen. Then twenty. They all had the same fuzzy halo surrounding them, moving almost in tandem but just slightly out of sync. Ol' Reliable was surrounded in all directions by nearly two dozen Cynthias blinking so rapidly in and out of existence that the naked eye couldn't keep up.

"No laws can hold this princess back, not even the laws of physics!"

Blow after blow came raining down on the old mining bot, too fast and varied to guard or dodge against. It tried to land another hit against one of the Cynthias, but it blinked out of existence before taking any damage.

Within seconds of this unforgiving barrage, Ol' Reliable came shuddering to a halt and broke out into a billowy, smoky mess, unable to keep standing.

Bow's eyes nearly bugged out of his skull. "What was that?!"

Hordak couldn't stop the grin from taking over his face. " That is the woman I'm going to marry."

"Ladies, gentlemen, and battle-bot enthusiasts of all genders and species," Rumble Roar proudly declared, waving the tattered shreds of his purple t-shirt high over his head, "It is my honor to announce our victor and bestow the crown to Queen Entrapta of Dryl!"

The cockpit hissed open, revealing a bedraggled but enthusiastic Entrapta bounding up from her control hub. She curtsied gracelessly in her oil-stained coveralls, grinning with sweat running down her face as not-Peekablue took the stage and delicately placed the crown on her head with all the theatricality and pomp they could summon forth.

Even with the wildly cheering crowd around them, Entrapta's gaze immediately fell straight on Hordak. He was cheering loudest of all.

Within minutes, Hordak found himself fighting against a small ocean of spectators to reach the backstage area, housed in a large steel and concrete building. He managed to break free by discovering a hidden door with one of Entrapta's signature locking mechanisms that led to a quiet maintenance corridor. It didn't take long for him to locate the mech bay. The sounds of metal clanging against metal and tools revving up were unmistakable, even through the cacophonous echoes of excited chattering that dominated the rest of the building.

Entrapta was halfway in Cynthia's cockpit, fiddling with the main computer system while her shiny new crown dangled at her hip from a strap hooked to her coveralls. She perked her head up at his approach, dropped her tools on the spot and launched herself with her hair to intercept him with a full-body hug.

Hordak wheezed at the impact but couldn't help the smile on his face. "This was your secret project? A giant purple cat mech?"

"I thought it'd be a fun surprise for you, too. Isn't Cynthia gorgeous? I can't wait to share her schematics; I've been having so much fun going through all of our old Horde projects for inspiration. Minus the whole part about destabilizing the fabric of reality."

He chuckled at her excitement and hugged her even tighter to him, grateful and relieved that Entrapta's efforts had led to success. His lab partner, his Queen, his wife-to-be deserved all the respect and fanfare that this world could possibly offer her.

"You kicked my ass!" Trigger chortled loudly, clapping her on the back. "Nice work with that rapid-fire teleporter, by the way. How'd you pull that off without a cooldown?"

Entrapta beamed. "It's a quantum destabilizer! I couldn't have done it without Hordak. He's the one who introduced me to practical quantum mechanics back in the Horde days. It was part of our first big project together." She rose up on her hair to give her partner a kiss on the cheek. "Do you want to see the formulas?"

"Eh, I'm an old dog. I think these fancy new tricks are a bit above my head, kid." Trigger shrugged. "I'm glad you've found someone who can keep up with you. I know your parents would be, too."

A tall, stately figure with suspiciously familiar yellow eyes approached. "Not to interrupt such a touching moment here, but there's a lineup of fans and subjects dying for a photo op with the Queen."

"Oh! Right. Princess stuff." Entrapta ruffled Hordak's hair before going to follow them out. "Well, Queen stuff now, I guess. I'll be back!"

The two men stood in awkward silence for a moment. Trigger propped against the wall and reached for his prosthetic leg. He unlatched a hidden compartment and produced a small flask, gulping down a mouthful of the stuff with a grimace. He swiveled his head to face Hordak with an intense glare. "No need to scowl at me like that, kid. I'm too old for day drinking. It's just a little something we use down in the mines to stay awake through long shifts."

Hordak didn't think he was scowling.

"So. You're the boyfriend I've heard so much about."

"Fiancée," Hordak muttered defensively.

"Look, I'm gonna be real here: Entrapta's different from other folks. She's wired a little differently, and that's all well and good, but I'm man enough to admit where I've screwed up, too. Back when Sis—" Trigger inhaled shakily, rubbing a palm against his mechanical knee. "—ah, never mind, it's old news, and it shouldn't be any of your business anyway unless Entrapta decides to make it your business. Point is, I haven't always been there for her when she needed me. Too many times. I'm trying to do better."

"Challenging her to a duel for the throne is your way of 'doing better'?"

"If it wasn't me, it was going to be someone else, and it wouldn't have been this fun for her," Trigger said soberly. "You're a smart guy, right? Of course you are—my niece wouldn't settle for someone who couldn't keep up with her. You've heard what folks are saying, and you know what it means for her. She hasn't been the most politically active princess around here—a lot of that is my fault, too. Council's still split on whether they tolerate or hate you. And as far as citizen opinion goes, sure you've still got support from ex-Horde, but there's a lot of our population that's concerned with the optics and after effects of naturalizing the losing side of the war. It's the perfect storm for infighting. Or a full-blown coup."

"So you decided to challenge her authority during our engagement announcement?"

Trigger grimaced. "It worked, didn't it? She needed a moment to assert herself, loud and proud, and put on a good show of it. Give the folks something to talk about that puts her in a better light to start the next stage of her leadership. Plus," he grinned with a twinkle in his eye, "Now those prudes on the council know exactly what she's capable of if they decide to try and cross her. And now you know what shenanigans I can pull if you do wrong by her. A win-win all around."

"How can you say that? She's been working herself sick over this duel. If anything happened to her…if the quantum destabilizer malfunctioned, or if something ignited the wrong way…"

Hordak was suddenly aware of how loud his voice had become during this exchange, and how imposing he must be compared to the short-statured older man in front of him. In Hordak's current position, towering over Uncle Trigger, he almost seemed frail.

Hordak cleared his throat and took two steps back. "I know it may be difficult to understand why Entrapta has chosen me to be her partner. I cannot tell you how many times I have questioned this, myself. But she did choose me, and because of that, I will do all I can to protect her from the dangers of this world and the wider universe around us."

Uncle Trigger cocked his head. "You've come a long way from the warlord you used to be, haven't you? Good to see you still have a bit of fire in your belly. Ha!"

The vents above them creaked open.

Without even looking up, Hordak outstretched his arms in time to catch Entrapta as she plummeted from the ceiling vent. "I got bored at the meet and greet, so Double Trouble took over for me," she grinned breathlessly as her hair coiled up around Hordak's shoulders. "Are you two having fun talking about the bots?"

"Your boyfriend threatened to beat me up," Trigger said with a grin.

"Fiancee," Entrapta corrected without batting an eye. "And you probably deserved it, Uncle Trigg."

"I did not–" Hordak attempted to say, but Entrapta booped him playfully with her hair and kissed him on the cheek.

"I see why you keep him around," Trigger nodded appreciatively.

"He's the best!" Entrapta swooned, wrapping her legs around Hordak's waist and slowly but surely pulling him toward Cynthia with her hair. "Did you want to stay for the schematics, or–?"

"I'll leave you lovebirds alone. Are we still on for Tuesday dinner?"

"Yep!" She answered spritely, and waved as Trigger left the mech bay, then returned her attention to her beloved lab partner. "Uncle Trigg says he'd come over to help us sort through some of the bureaucracy stuff. Turns out there's a lot of paperwork that needs to get filed for a princess to get married."

"A queen, " Hordak said, giving her thigh an affectionate squeeze.

Entrapta narrowed her eyes darkly. “Hey, let’s save the schematics for later. Let me show you another trick Cynthia can do.” Without leaving her position wrapped snugly around his torso, she escorted him via hair to the sleek, spacious cockpit of her most recent invention. “Hey, this cockpit is spacious enough to fit two.” She waggled her eyebrows suggestively and whispered something directly into Hordak’s ear that sent him reeling back in surprise.

“Entrapta!”

“What?” She devolved into a fit of giggles while his face turned beet red. “Okay, that was pretty bad, but will you indulge me? Cynthia’s got reclining seats and a soundproof barrier around the plexiglass windshield. And a secret mini fridge with snacks.”

He held her tenderly, letting her hair worm its way through the crevices of armor. This woman—his lab partner, his Queen, his soon-to-be wife—was going to be the death of him.

“As you wish, my Queen.”

Chapter End Notes

I feel like the fight here isn't as grand as I anticipated but I'm not good at epic fight scenes! I just wanted to skip to the awkward "welcome to the family, son" conversation lol.

Random facts about Uncle Trigger that I just made up because he's my OC and it's fun:

Some of his paperwork lists his full first name as "Trigonometry". It's unclear as to whether this is his legal name, birth name, a typo, or just a math joke.

He lost his leg in the deeper Dryl caves during a recovery mission to locate Entrapta's parents after their disappearance. He didn't want to stop the recovery mission, but it was called off after his accident, forcing him to focus on his own recovery and caring for his young niece. Instead of doing either, he doubled down on his work in the mines. He's at least 30% the reason why Entrapta copes with stress by doubling down on her work. It's a family trait.

His hobbies include rock collecting and bomb fishing.
