After all this time, Adora knew that she could beat Catra in a fair fight. Catra was faster and had good instincts, but her technique was far less refined than her own, and she lacked the endurance required for a drawn-out fight. Adora could wear her out and pin her down.

All these reasons combined to make her incredibly furious when she was pinned to the mat, a wooden training sword pressed to her side as Catra tenderly leaned one foot onto her wielding wrist. "Say it." She gloated from a position of unparalleled authority. Adora tried to yank her wrist free, grabbing with her spare arm in vain hope. "Say it." Catra growled, leaning in.

Adora slumped back, ponytail spilling out behind her. "You win." She snapped.

"Atta girl," Catra kicked Adora's sword away and sprawled down on the mat beside her. "You know," She curled a hand behind Adora's head to gather the splayed ponytail together, where she could twirl it around her finger. "You don't have to take it so personally every time I win."

"Of course it's personal!" Adora snapped, glaring at the ceiling. "You go out of your way to get on my nerves."

"I really don't," Catra mused, still twirling the gold locks around her finger. "You just get all hot and bothered around me."

"IT'S SWORDFIGHTING!" Adora yelled, the words echoing around the empty hall. "You're acting like I'm obsessed when I'm barely fucking interested!"

"Uh-huh," Catra smoothed the hair against the mat, curling it in like a cat tail. "You keep telling yourself that."

"I hope the planet explodes." Adora smothered both hands over her face.

"Loses one match, hopes the planet blows up." Even without sight, that damn smirk was evident in the tone. "Overly dramatic much?"

"I am exactly the right amount of dramatic!" Adora groaned. "You're not even a trained fighter, I'm the actual trained fighter! I could fold you like tinfoil and annihilate you!"

"Hmm," Catra purred. "That's certainly tempting," She leaned in, her breath ghosting past Adora's ear. "And you said that I don't get you hot and bothered."

"Arrggh!" Adora growled. "I need to be the better swordsman."

Catra uncurled one arm from Adora's face and tucked it behind her head so that she could curl in. "Judging from your win record, that's a long way from happening."

"We're tied!" Adora snapped.

"You're forgetting the Salenian tournament," Catra grinned.

"That match didn't count, the entire competition was revoked!" The HEMA organisation behind it had been so rocked by the corruption scandal that it had been deemed unrecoverable. The quickest (and laziest, according to Glimmer) solution had been to simply establish a replacement organisation, rebuilding from the ground up with fully vetted and cleared members. They had carried over all the established protocols and practices from the former iteration and tacked 'New' to the end of their name to make it legally distinct. Catra had taken one look at the new acronym and asked Adora if she had been in charge of the naming - 'HE-MAN' was about as redundant as padding to protect her hairpoof.

"Quality counts for something, Princess," Catra grinned. "And I seem to be winning all the important fights."

"You're so stupidly smug." Adora glowered as she finally turned her head to acknowledge the taunting presence on her shoulder.

She had no idea how Cat continued to get a rise out of her like this.

"And you have an overinflated ego." Catra stuck her tongue out.

"Overinfl-" Adora spluttered. "I'd say my sense of self is perfectly intact!"

"Really?" Catra rolled over until her back was to Adora but her face was cupped by the trapped hand. "Yet I keep getting the feeling that you're obsessed with me."

"Obsessed!" Adora wrenched her arm free and shoved Catra away. "Well, you're insufferable!"

"I'll see you later." Catra laughed after her retreating back.

Adora stood with Bow and Glimmer, anxiously adjusting her outfit as they waited for Catra to join them. "I hate her." Adora growled to one side.

"I know." Glimmer murmured absently.

"I really hate her." She insisted, tugging at the straps on her dress.

"Of course you do," Glimmer agreed, forcing her hands aside to check the set of her outfit again. Getting Adora into the dress had required all her patience, and eventually sending Bow out of the room to weep somewhere else. "You've made your feelings very clear."

"This was all her stupid idea." Adora snarled, shifting uncomfortably.

"I thought you said we did really good on this?" Scorpia whispered loudly from a few feet away.

"You did perfect!" Glimmer raised a pair of thumbs in her direction.

"Are we allowed to be talking?" Entrapta leaned into view from behind Scorpia. "I thought we had to wait in silence!"

"We should be," Bow rolled his eyes as he leaned to peer around Glimmer and Adora. "But Adora keeps fidgeting."

"You do all know that I can hear you, right?" Micah said testily from between the two sides.

"Sorry Dad," Glimmer apologised. "Adora's going to behave, right Adora?" With another mutter about how stupid Catra was, and how much she hated her, Adora fell silent.

"Okay," Micah sighed, pinching his brows, and promising himself a warm bath and early bed for the next week if he held it together long enough to get through this. "Where is Catra? She was supposed to be here by now."

"I'll go find her," Adora offered.

"You take one step from there, and I'll stab you myself." Glimmer hissed the insult through a beaming smile.

"I'll help you hide the body." Scorpia grinned from across the divide.

"Again," Micah forced the words past a rictus grin. "Right here, hearing everything."

Adora's heartbeat was pounding in her ears, her mind was racing, and she had the irritating itch in her palm that could only be sated by holding a blade. "Hey Adora," Catra finally appeared. "Fancy seeing you here."

"Catra." She breathed, words failing her. "Nice-" She nodded, forgetting the word 'suit' as her entire vocabulary seized up.

"What, this thing?" She tugged the jacket into order as she sauntered up beside her. "It was lying around." A tailored three-piece suit in her size? Sure it was. But Adora was too overcome with the effect to argue.

"Do you two want a moment?" Micah interrupted. "Or shall we get on with it?"

"Please," Catra smirked, eyeing Adora pointedly. "Continue."

"Dearly beloved," Micah began in a strong tone that carried over the assembled horde of family and friends. "We are gathered here today because these two undertook a wager that, should Adora win the duel, they would hold an autumnal ceremony where Catra would wait at the altar. However, Catra proved the superior swordfighter that day, hence we are assembled for this lovely springtime event,"

"I can't believe you made him put that in the speech," Adora hissed out through her radiant smile as Micah continued his delivery.

"Believe it, Princess," Catra glared through a face of endless joy. "We agreed; winner gets to strut down the aisle, loser picks the season." Neither had been willing to compromise on either item, and their friends had been unsurprised that it ended in swords being drawn. "And you looked so pretty all dressed up, I think I would have won either way." Adora growled in her throat, and Glimmer shared a knowing glance with Bow.

"Adora?" Micah interrupted.

"Sorry." She apologised, flushing slightly.

"Your vows, Adora," Micah forced a tense smile,, stress veins pounding in his temple. This was not what he'd agreed to when Glimmer casually announced she'd had him ordained over the internet to officiate the wedding. (He'd not actually 'agreed' to any of this, but the pair were apparently conditioned to value his opinion as a tournament judge, and he was the only one keeping the ceremony from erupting into a full-on brawl.)

Everyone was in attendance. Micah had ~~been forced~~ kindly volunteered to officiate. Angella had declined to be in Adora's bridal party, and was seated in the front row, happily chatting with Adora's parents, Spinnerella and Netossa. A number of their competitors had been invited, for a mixture of reasons; Catra wanted to show off that she'd finally secured an undeniable victory and was here to claim her prize, while Adora wanted witnesses that she was doing this to spare anyone else from suffering an infuriating rivalry with her Cat.

Frosta looked ready to stab anyone in range, but that was her happy expression. Catra's most dispassionate competitor had attended on her invitation, supposedly for the free booze. Mermista had not been thrilled to learn that, while there were no plus ones available, Catra had convinced Adora to include Sea Hawk in her list. The old gym owner who had turned a blind eye to Catra's sporadic membership payments before she started winning competitions, Huntara, was slung across two chairs. This would have raised complaints about seating had she not pulled a fuming Juliet to sit on a muscled thigh thicker than most torsos. If Juliet was uncomfortable, she certainly wasn't complaining.

Seated in the back row were some friends they'd met while going through interviews about the Salenian tournament. Thorn, Kiki, Cyra, and Manin, the blue suit distinct from any distance. Thorn had been their particular favourite, having exposed facets of Shadow Weaver and Hordak's corrupting influence that had nearly evaded the authorities. The other three had been meddling nuisances, focused more on the perceived relationship between the legendary 'Strife' and her bitter rival 'the Cat', which had been complete nonsense at the time. The bride-to-be was almost certain that her fiancé had invited them just to be childish.

Then Adora heard Catra whisper something to snap her out of her haze. “I bet my speech is better than yours.” She just had to use that stupid cocky, flirty, sultry tone of hers, didn’t she?

"Not everything is a competition." She hissed back to her bride. "But if it were, I'd crush you."

"That'd be a first…" Catra muttered under her breath, also giving Adora a smirk as she did.

"Fuck you." Adora hissed.

"You can do that later, Princess-" Just as Adora was about to retort, Micah shut them up again with a glare. He gestured to the half-forgotten piece of paper that Adora had been holding in her hand for the past hour, because her stupid dress didn't have any pockets.

She could feel her palms start to sweat as she suddenly became very aware of all the people staring at them. Maybe Catra had been right and her speech would be much better than Adora's? What if her speech sucked and people would laugh at her? What if-

Suddenly two soft hands settled on her own, a thumb stroking over her knuckles as her fingers were squeezed ever so gently. Catra gave her a sweet smile, one that said 'It'll be alright, you've got this.'

"Catra, you're a brat." Chuckles could already be heard from all around them. "But I suppose that that is also one of the reasons that I started to like you. You challenge me, fight me, quite literally, don't agree with whatever I do or say. I can say with certainty that you've made my life so much more interesting. You're still untrained, a tease, and overall just an annoying brat, but you're my annoying brat."

She could practically feel Catra rolling her eyes at her sappy speech, but she also knew that beneath that stupid smirk there was a fond smile working its way towards her lips.

"After our first meeting, I had been so determined to hate you, despise you, to be your nemesis, to absolutely crush you. I would've never expected that I'd be crushing on you instead. You know as no other how I hate to rely on something as inconsequential as luck, but I may be the luckiest woman alive to have fought, hated, and loved you. I want to say I love you, but it wouldn't even express half of the feelings I have for you. So instead I'll do it like this: Cat, I'll always choose you. To fight, to kiss, to tease, and to love, but never could I ever go back to hating you. I choose you, Cat, and I always will."

When she finally looked up from her piece of paper and at her soon-to-be wife, she could see the tears that were starting to gather in the corners of Catra's bi-coloured eyes. Adora knew that if she ever brought that up she'd just deny it.

"Dork, idiot, dumbass, nerd, Princess. All of those are nicknames you've rightfully earned yourself." Catra sighed before giving Adora a fond smile. "But you're also sweet, kind, and anything but a quitter. I can also say with confidence that you're the most annoying and stuck-up person I've ever met. You've got an ego the size of a mountain, but lucky for you, you've also got the heart to match it. I can remember our first meeting when I was telling you that you were pretty, and fast, and strong,"

"Wait, what?!" Adora suddenly interrupted, eyes going wide as she stared at Catra with her mouth agape. A sudden comma had installed itself in the memory and changed everything.

"Yes, you idiot, I was trying to compliment you. Now, can I please continue my speech, so I can be done being all sappy?"

Adora gave her a small nod, still shocked by the revelation. "You can't take a compliment for the life of you, can't rest if there was a gun held to your head, and lying isn't even close to one of your talents. But you've got so much passion and love to give, so much so that sometimes I wish that you'd keep a little more for yourself. But until you learn to do that, I'll be there to help you with it and give you my whole heart. I'll fight for your heart, fight for your- for our love, fight so that we get to be us. I'll be there for you Adora, even when you don't want me to be, because that is how much I love you."

Her voice had started to crack near the end of her speech, betraying her usual cool demeanor. Halfway through, Adora's eyes had become watery, and a few stray tears had spilled down her cheeks as she looked and listened to the amazing woman in front of her.

“I totally won the speech competition.”

In that moment Adora didn’t even care about that, she just wanted the vows to be over so she could kiss this amazing nightmare of a woman. “I suppose you did.” She whispered back.

Micah cleared his throat next to them, eyes also watery as he gave them a sweet smile nonetheless. “Alright, now for the I do’s.” He looked over to Adora. “I, Adora Grayskull,”

“I, Adora Grayskull,”

“Take you, Catra D’riltuh,”

“Take you, Catra D’riltuh”

“To be my lawfully wedded wife.”

“To be my waffley- shit.” Adora covered her face with her free hand as she groaned, while people laughed fondly at her.

Catra could be heard laughing so hard, a few small snorts were accompanied with it. “I knew you liked waffles, but never thought you’d like them more than me.”

“Shut up!” She said, her face red with embarrassment.

“Ladies.” Micah interrupted them once more, before continuing with the I do’s. Finishing with ‘Till death do us part.’

“Now Catra, repeat after me. I, Catra D’riluth,”

“I, Catra D’riluth,”

“Take you, Adora Grayskull,”

“Take you, Adora Happysmile Rainbowfist” she smirked at her soon to be wife, at least that was if they would ever actually get through this ceremony.

“Cat, we’re being serious. Please just work with us for once.” She gave her a stern look, hoping to get her point across a little better.

Catra rolled her eyes, but relented nonetheless. “Alright, alright. Take you, Adora Grayskull,”

Except for a small joke at the for richer and for poorer part, saying that she’d rather Adora stay rich, Catra didn’t interrupt the I do’s. That was until the last bit. “Till death do us part.”

“I don’t know, that seems like a waffley long time.” She smirked at Adora, that familiar teasing look in her eyes. No one was having it though, since soon a chorus of ‘Catra’ could be heard from everyone present. “Alright, alright, geez. Till death do us part.” She smiled at Adora in a way that threatened to make her knees buckle. At that moment she remembered why she had wanted to marry this nightmare of a woman.

"You may now-" Adora wasted no time, grabbing Catra by the lapels and dragging her in. It was another battlefield, neither side willing to give ground without gaining an advantage. "Kiss the bride." Micah finished sternly as the applause began.

The pair parted, one face glowering, one face smirking.

"You're obsessed." Adora glared.

"And you can't keep me outta your mouth." Catra grinned with their faces still close.

"Well," Micah sighed, tucking his folder under one arm. "I'm done, I quit, and I'm never going to do this again. Now, if you'll all join me at the bar, the brides will have their first dance, and I think we'll all need a bracing drink."

"Get us one while you're there." Catra grinned.

"Two." Adora insisted as their officiant slipped by.

"And after I brought you flowers?" Catra pouted, bringing her bouquet up between them.

"Scorpia!" Adora seized the flowers and tossed them over Catra's shoulder.

"Take care of those." Catra grinned as she was pulled towards the dance hall.

"Er, right," Scorpia looked around, helplessly swept along with the crowd. "Entrapta, could you," Her constant companion had disappeared. Looking around in search of her, Scorpia bumbled awkwardly into a gorgeous woman with flowers in her hair. "Oh," She blushed. "Hello."

"Hi." The woman beamed, nervously stroking a set of tresses draped over her shoulder.

"Hello." Scorpia repeated.

Bow instantly saw the next ten minutes of dialogue and smoothly slipped in before they could happen. "Scorpia, this is Perfuma; she designed the floral arrangements. Perfuma, Scorpia is Catra's trainer."

"We met," Perfuma smiled at Bow whilst still looking at Scorpia. "She helped me set it all up."

"These are your flowers." Scorpia held out the bunch.

Perfuma gathered the flowers in her hands and smiled gently. "They're a mix of red tulips and cornflowers. Catra wanted a special order."

"I noticed that," Scorpia blushed. "I meant that you should have them. Because you're flowers. They're your flowers. You're good with flowers, that is."

"We should put them in water," Perfuma suggested. "They'll last a lot longer that way."

"There's probably a tap in the kitchen." Scorpia suggested.

"And a vase, if we're lucky!" Grabbing Scorpia by the elbow, she happily guided them towards the hallway.

"Oh no," Glimmer breathed. "It's happening again."

"How are they so oblivious?" Bow wailed, clutching at his head.

Micah grabbed the bartender's arm as they went to retract the bottle. "Better make it a double." He said bracingly.

"Two doubles." Angella sighed, joining him. "She gets this from you." She warned her husband.

"Trouble in paradise?" Double Trouble asked as they smoothly filled the orders.

"Nightmare in purgatory." Angella corrected.

"Is this about the lovely young ladies, or your daughter and her paramour?" DT gave a knowing grin.

"Both." Micah sighed as the music began.

"Fret not," DT smiled with a hint of nefarious glee. "I'm sure the newlyweds will be willing to lend their assistance - with suitable support, of course."

Angella shrugged, weighing the wisdom of allowing Double Trouble to meddle in affairs against the odds of Bow naturally confessing his love for her daughter. It was not a close call.

"Hey," Adora probed as they swung through the formal dance. "Why did you invite those three? I can stand Thorn but"

"Me?" Catra blinked in surprise. "I thought you invited them?" Her expression hardened instantly. "Swing me." Adora complied, dropping her wife to sweep the surroundings in an inverted stare. "Those sneaky bastards!"

The three crashers had somehow managed to grab the entire roast and were making a swift exit as the rest of the audience were distracted by the dance.

"I'm going to chop their fucking heads off." Adora swore.

"Temper, Mrs Grayskull." Catra chidded as she was rightened again.

It was like hitting a reset switch. Adora's face glazed over, her scowl vanished, and her eyes unfocused. "Adora?" Catra tightened her grip in worry.

"Mrs Grayskull." She echoed hollowly, twirling in an arch on instinct.

"Mrs Grayskull." Catra affirmed.

"Ugh," Adora shuddered in her arms. "I don't think I'll ever get used to that."

"Oh?" Catra's ears pricked. "You could be Mrs D'riluth instead?" The secret to a long marriage is not stabbing your spouse on the wedding day. It's difficult, but most people make it.

Adora was not sure that she was going to be one of those people.

"Hey, everyone!" Entrapta yelled from the outskirts of the crowd, enthusiastically waving a mallet in one hand. The mallet flew from her hand, landing out of sight with a suspicious crunch. "Oops," She glanced after the impact before shrugging and giving up. "It's ready!"

"What's ready?" Adora glared at her new wife.

"Don't look at me," Catra shrugged. "I'm innocent." She grinned in a way that any judge would permit as evidence.

"Scorpia deserves the credit for this one." Glimmer explained, ushering the pair towards the rambunctious analyst.

"Naw, not really," Scorpia explained to the woman at her side. "Catra said that she wished that she didn't have to skip practice for this - I just asked the venue if we could borrow their garden."

"For 'this'?" Adora scowled. "You didn't want to miss practice for our wedding?"

"Scorpia's exaggerating," Catra laughed as she leaned affectionately against her side. "I said that I was looking forward to getting some practice kicking your arse."

Entrapta had set up a simple ring outside, slightly smaller than regulation size but plenty big enough for a bout. "We couldn't get any real swords." Glimmer apologised, rushing over with a pair of wooden training weapons.

"But I brought you the good water!" Bow beamed, holding up a pair of flasks.

"Er, no," Scorpia glowered. "I bought the good water."

"Don't worry," Adora ducked under the rope that Catra was holding up for her. "I won't need it - this'll be over quickly."

"Oh?" Catra swished the wooden blade before settling into a ready position. "Going to give up?"

"Dear?" Angella calmly swapped her empty glass for her husband's fuller one. "Single contact blow, no retaliation, and I want to see some restraint." And people in hell wanted ice water.

The first exchanges were easy enough, mere light taps against the opposing blade as they figured out the threshold of swings. It escalated after that, testing the limits of movement and speed. Catra had expected Adora's stunning dress to restrain her footwork, but it was as functional as it was formal. Had her wife entered wedding planning with a tactical mindset? Catra couldn't stop herself from grinning at the thought. Then she made a fatal mistake - reaching for an ox guard that strained the reach of her suit.

Adora's eyes flashed as she picked up the unmistakable scent of panic in Catra's movements. No matter how they circled the arena, Catra's sword wasn't going higher than two-thirds up her torso - the sleeves of her jacket were limiting her movements to keep from tearing.

"Hey Catra," She bared her teeth in a snarl. "Remember in the Salenian tournament when you bashed me in the head?"

"I thought we agreed that match didn't count?" Catra swallowed. Adora had obviously noticed the restrictions on her movement. This had started as a fun way to blow off steam, something to unwind from the tensions of the day, but blood had just entered the water.

Adora grinned. "Then I've got something entirely new to show you." She swung wide, testing her theory. Catra blocked the attack with a plough guard, stumbling at the force of the impact: Adora wasn't playing around anymore.

The blonde grinned, instantly swapping to a schielhau that targeted Catra's open shoulder. Her boastful bride responded with the unorthodox tactic of sweeping backwards, watching the wooden blade blur ahead of her face as she recoiled like a spring. It might have been the blood rushing to her head, but she could feel her heartbeat like never before.

Adora was stumbling from the lack of resistance to her swing, leaving her unguarded for a precious moment. Catra darted in, aiming for her leg. If she could land a single decent strike on the limb, Adora would be forced to concede the match. And then Adora performed the one act she'd always scolded Catra for - she flouted training, went completely against established methods, and stepped towards the blow. Kicking down at the blade, she tore the handle from Catra's grip.

But she wasn't sated with a simple disarmament, grabbing the falling shoulder in a tight grasp, spinning it around her now firmly planted foothold, and smashing the startled face into the ground barely two feet from her fallen weapon. "Yield." She growled, kneeling astride her with the splintered notches of her training weapon pressed tightly to Catra's throat.

Catra swallowed, looking over to the handle of her sword. It lay trapped, embedded beneath Adora's shin. She'd left nothing to chance. "Well," She looked up into those furious grey eyes. "I'm certainly looking forward to seeing more of this view later. Bring this energy too, it's really doing it for me." Adora's heaving chest froze as Catra grinned up at her.

"Match, Adora!" Angella yelled from the side, saving the guests from an embarrassing display by mere heartbeats.

"Well, Mrs D'riluth," Adora sneered as she regained control and relaxed her grip. "The score's one to nothing."

"I'll let you have the lead, Mrs Grayskull," Catra grinned, letting Adora lift her from the ground. "For now."

Glimmer and Bow pulled Adora to one side as Catra sauntered over to Scorpia. "Are you okay?" Glimmer straightened the straps on her dress. Despite the wild action, it hadn't fallen out of place.

"Yeah," Adora huffed, wiping the sweat off her brow with the back of her fist. Keeping ahold of the sword was the only reason her sanity had remained intact. "I guess I needed to blow off some steam."

"Most brides tend to have a couple glasses of champagne," Glimmer pointed out. "Some tiny quiches or something."

"Hors d'œuvres." Bow corrected.

"Yeah, or droves," Glimme nodded sagely. Bow groaned, wondering which woman was more thick-headed at that moment. "Not beat their wife into the ground."

"Everyone wishes they had someone they could annihilate in martial combat," Adora grinned, still breathing heavily.

"Not usually." Bow refuted.

"Catra gets it." Adora turned to glance at her wife.

Scorpia was holding the muddy stain that the jacket had become. That new friend of hers, Perfuma, was explaining that it was best to use dry cloths to get as much dirt out as possible first, to prevent it staining in. Entrapata was rambling about something, probably, Adora was running out of available brain power by that point.

Catra was wearing a crisp shirt under her jacket. Light, since it was an unusually warm day, and paired nicely with her waistcoat. The thin material had become moistened from their skirmish, enough to highlight her slender physique below. Adora could see those ridiculous shoulder muscles tense and roll as she lifted her arms, free from the restraints. The sharp cut of the waistcoat did nothing to help, accentuating the taunt outlines of those stupid, attractive, shoulder muscles.

Glimmer physically wrestled the sword from her unconsciously clenching grasp as Bow restrained her from storming over again.

[18 months later]

"Ugh," Adora scoffed as she placed her boots by the front door. "Every day, I find something new I hate about this painting."

"Really?" Catra had heard the door open, and was leaning casually against the wall as her wife arrived. "Weird - every day, I find out another reason why I like it."

They had been so distracted by the three wedding crashers supposedly stealing the expensive roast (that they had simply relocated to the kitchen) that neither bride had noticed the item they had snuck into the wedding presents.

Catra, of course, simply adored the baroque oil painting and hung it in the hallway so that it was the first item any visitors would see. It depicted the two of them in full battle armour, sans helmets, engaged in a tense struggle for control of the swords. The classical smirk on Catra's face was mirrored by the infuriated strain on Adora's.

"How was your day?" Catra said pleasantly. "Kids give you any grief?"

"No more than usual," The blonde sighed. With a reputation like hers, it had been easy to obtain a teaching position at Bright Moon Academy. She was still allowed time off for competitions, but needed the steady paycheck to support her new lifestyle. "How about you?"

"Are you kidding?" Catra snorted. "I'm getting paid more than you, and all I have to do is show a few rich kids how to handle a wooden sword a few times a month." Unlike her wife, Catra had gone down the route of being a private tutor, charging rates based upon her students' success rates in matches - she was very well paid, much to the chagrin of her partner.

"You're making a mockery of the sport!" Adora snapped. "They're using random techniques all over the place, ignoring standard rules of combat, and constantly getting on my nerves!"

"By winning?" Catra suggested.

"Yes!" Adora yelled as loudly as she dared. It was drowned out by a car passing outside.

Still, "Quiet!" Catra hissed, glaring at her rival. "I've barely got them to lay down twenty minutes ago!"

"Sorry," Adora apologised. "I didn't know."
Catra grunted, leading her down the hallway to the most valued room in the apartment. Lying in perfect serenity, making grabby hands in the air, their infant child was happily napping away. "Honestly, between my lungs and your temperament, it's a wonder I'm not deaf." Even so, she was smiling. Finn was a rambunctious child, always eager to explore the world around them.

"I've got something for them." Adora reached into the paper bag she was carrying as she snuck into the room. Sliding up to the cot, she slowly pulled out a large plushie and, with a final check there were no dangerous parts available, lowered it onto the blanket.

"It's bigger than they are." Catra laughed softly, watching Adora carefully tuck the plushie in alongside the sleeping infant.

"Shuddup," Adora grumbled. "Thorn made it for them, it's staying right there." Finn solidified the decision by fastening onto the slender creature and pulling it tight without waking.

"Not as if I'm going to take it," Catra raised her hands. "You know those things freak me out."

"I'm sure those stories about people getting eaten by them are made up." Adora rolled her eyes as she snuck back to the doorway.

"Uh-huh," Catra said doubtfully. "Remind me, how did he lose those three fingers again?"

"Accidents at work." Adora shot back.

"Right," Catra glanced meaningfully towards the pooka plushie. "Raising carnivorous beasts."

"You're a carnivorous beast." Adora echoed sarcastically.

"Explains where Finn's appetite comes from," Catra grinned. "Honestly, I've never heard of a baby eating as much as they do. They're like my personal terror pooka."

"Catra!" Adora swatted her shoulder. "That's a terrible thing to say about a baby!"

"Hey, it's your baby." Catra shrugged easily. "If the tiny shoe fits."

"Why did I even marry you?" Adora grumbled, leaning against her shoulder.

"Because you knew there was no way to beat me," Catra tenderly kissed the top of her head. "And, if you can't beat 'em, join 'em."

"I can totally beat you," She growled, snaking her arm around Catra's back as she straightened up.

"Oh?" She knew exactly what Adora was implying. "You know what I want to do?" Catra hinted, placing Adora's hands on her hips and mirroring the posture by grabbing her waist.

"What?" Adora raised a mocking eyebrow as she was pulled in the direction of the bedroom.

"Finn's been awake all day," Catra whispered, stumbling backwards with an excited grin. "They'll be asleep for at least the next five hours. Five hours, Adora," One hand detached from her hip to open the handle. "We can do exactly what I want for five hours." Her knees hit the edge of their bed, knocking her down and tugging Adora onto her lap. "You know what I want, don't you?"

Adora's mouth leaned in, capturing hers in a soft kiss. "Little spoon," She whispered lovingly. "Far side of the bed, so you can see me sprint to Finn as soon as they start moving." Catra nodded happily, letting herself be shuffled across the duvet as Adora snuck up behind her and wrapped her tight.

"Hey, Adora?" She murmured, feeling the warm love fill her body, seeping down to her very soul.

"Yeah?" Her wife whispered gently.

"I totally won."

"Ugh," The noise of playful disgust was chased by a gentle kiss. "I'll call it a draw."

"For now." Catra grinned, pulling the arms tight around her.
