Poor Wingmen, Bar Pickups

by AuthorWithoutaName

Summary

Teela and Adam are visiting Adora. Unlike her, the two of them love things like the nightlife and going out to bars to drink. Always feeling the need to be a good hostess, Adora takes them to a bar. There, she happens to see the most beautiful woman she's ever seen. Unfortunately, Adam has noticed too and has decided that his dear sister needs a wingman.

(Based on the SPOP Creative Flex server weekly prompt: Sibling Embarrassment)

Notes

Alright! Another weekly prompt written and posted! Hoping to eventually get some of the past prompts written and posted soon!

“Come on, ‘Dora! Just do it! Why are you so scared?”

Adam flashed her one of his trademark smiles. It was big and bright. He was practically laying across the bar, leaning forward, peering around Teela to talk. He had nearly knocked over his beer when he had done so. The bottle had begun to topple. He had hurriedly snatched it before it could fall and spill, his face turning bright red. That would have been a mess. The barkeeper had just opened that beer for him.

“I mean, we don’t even know if she’s into women,” Adora countered. She dared to cast a quick, fleeting glance at the she in question. Sitting at a table in the corner of this dimly lit bar was a magicat and she was the most beautiful woman Adora had ever seen.

Adora had seen her the moment her, Adam, and Teela had stepped inside the bar. She had stopped, as if her feet had become glued to the spot, her eyes solely on the magicat. Adam had bumped into her. Somehow that that garnered the magicat’s attention. As soon as those mismatched eyes landed on her, Adora felt her face turn red and hot. Adam had noticed (of course he had!). And since then, her brother had been pestering her about asking the gorgeous woman out. And to make it even worse, Teela was letting him! Wasn’t Teela supposed to be her friend too?

Teela had been quiet ever since the three of them had entered the bar. She had ordered her drink (some cocktail that Adora could never remember the name of or the ingredients in it), and had been largely ignoring her and Adam. She would take a sip of the pink colored cocktail in front of her and then would alternate between checking her phone or taking a quick glance around the bar. Adora really needed Teela to rejoin her and Adam and refocus her brother.

“We don’t know that she isn’t,” Adam replied, clucking his tongue as if that sound made him seem smarter. “You can’t assume everyone is straight, ‘Dora,” he added matter-of-factly.

Adora closed her eyes and sighed. Her arms were folded on the bar. Like Adam, she was leaning forward, peering around Teela. If Teela had no interest in the conversation, maybe they should switch seats? It was already hard enough to talk to or hear Adam with pop music blaring overhead. Maybe it would be easier if they were sitting next to each other?

"Alright." Adora opened her eyes. She did her best to look determined. She wasn't scared after all. She was thinking about this rationally. She wanted to pinch the bridge of her nose. If she showed any sign of irritation or annoyance though, it would just add more fuel to the fire.

"You. Are. Correct." Why did arguing with Adam feel like arguing with a brick wall? He was technically correct. There was no way of knowing if the woman was straight or gay. She did, technically have a shot with the woman (until she asked and was more than likely given a polite no).

"You can't assume a person is straight," Adora agreed. She hated agreeing with Adam. He was almost always an ass about being right, "but you also can't assume that they're gay either!" The perfect counter! Victory!

"Correct! So until you ask, you should assume that someone is bi!" Adam replied, one finger pointing in the air as if to emphasize his point. Adora huffed, frustrated. She wanted nothing more than to wipe that smug smile off his face.

Adam turned his attention towards Teela and clasped her shoulder. His smile grew bigger, bright, and more mischievous.

"Teela, you got my back, right? Please explain to my dear, younger sister, that she shouldn't be scared and she should go and ask the woman over there," he gestured with a nod towards the corner where the magicat woman was, "out. The worst thing the woman could say is no."

No. The worst thing the gorgeous woman could say is hell no, followed by laughing. That could happen, right? That fear was enough reason to keep Adora in her seat at the bar. Wait… Did Adam just call her his younger sister?

"Adam, you guys are twins," Teela said suddenly. Her eyes were glued on her phone. She was typing something. She would stop, wait, and then type some more. "You're only like ten minutes older and even then, Adora has better judgement than you."

Yes! Adora could hug Teela right now!

"Most of the time," Teela continued, not looking up from her phone.

And… there goes the sudden urge to hug…

Teela glanced away from her phone, her eyes meeting Adora's. She didn't put away her phone though. Whatever she was doing on it, she wasn't finished.

"Adora, if you're interested, it's worth asking. Like Adam said, you don't know for sure the woman is straight. I disagree with his stance that everyone is bi. I mean, she could just not be interested in romantic relationships regardless."

See! Another reason why she shouldn't approach the beautiful woman! What if she was just bothering her?

"I know how you think." Teela was still watching her. Her brow furrowed, her eyes held a bit of concern. "You're probably overthinking things. The woman could be straight. If she is, she'll just say no. She won't laugh at you and if she does, that's her problem, not yours. If she isn't looking for a relationship, she'll just say no. Again, she shouldn't laugh at you. She might be flattered, she might not."

That… That did make sense. Logically it did! It was hard for Adora to make her brain shut up though. Overthinking was what she did best. When they were younger, Adam would call her brain her biggest alley and also her greatest enemy. To her ever growing frustration with her brother, he was right. She hated when he was right.

"But…" Teela continued on, her voice tapering off as she returned her attention to her phone. Teela began typing again. She didn't glance back at Adora. She didn't say anything else. Her eyes were glued to her phone. Who was she texting? Was everything okay?

The silence was beginning to gnaw at Adora. Eat at her.

But…

But what?

"Well," Adam pushed his barstool back and used the bar to propel himself off of the stool and onto his feet. "I'm going to…" He glanced over his shoulder at Adora. He was trying to keep his face neutral. Unfortunately for him, his usual mischievous grin flickered across his face. He seemed to have caught himself and his face flashed back to a neutral, non-smiling and unnatural (for him) look.

"I'm going to…" He looked as if he were deep in thought, considering something. His gaze flickered away from Adora. He seemed to be scanning the room for something. He looked back at Adora finally.

"I'm going to go to the bathroom! Be right back!" He started off in the direction of the bathroom. With his back to Adora and Teela, he gave a wave and added, "Don't wait up!" His voice was nearly a shout to combat the blare of the music.

Adora gave Adam a quizzical glance as he walked away. She had turned around in her barstool when he had gotten up. She turned back towards the bar. Her gaze flickered towards Teela. She was still typing away on her phone, completely oblivious that Adam had left.

Adora turned her attention to her own drink on the bar. It was a cocktail of some sort. She couldn't remember the name of it. She wasn't even sure what was in it. It was a light blue. It tasted… alright. She wasn't much of a drinker. But Adam and Teela had wanted to come out here and since they were here visiting her, she couldn't say no.

Teela placed her phone on the bar.

"Alright!" She began, looking at Adora. "I know one of the ladies with that woman you were looking at."

Adora straightened up in her seat. "W-what?"

"Scorpia. She met at a camp back in high school and she seemed pretty cool so we've kept in touch over the years," Teela continued on. She nodded back towards the absolutely gorgeous magicat woman. Adora hadn't noticed it before, but the woman wasn't alone. A scorpini woman sat with her, alongside another woman with purple hair and a thick pair of goggles over her forehead.

"Anyway, Scorpia said that her friend Catra, the woman you've been crushing on since she got here–"

"Wait! I haven't been crushing on her! I don't even know her!" Adora interjected.

Teela waved her off and continued, "Any. Way." She spoke slowly and loudly, as if that would get Adora to shut up and listen. Sadly enough, it worked. Adora immediately shut her mouth. She nodded, prompting Teela to continue, "Catra, the woman, is gay and she is single. So if you wanted to ask her–"

Ding!

Teela's phone lit up. She glanced at it, her eyes immediately growing wide. "Fuck!" She refocused her attention on her phone and furiously began to type.

Fuck? That didn't sound good!

"Wh-what?" Adora asked, feeling her anxiety rising. Was this text from Scorpia? Was it about Catra? Or was it someone else? Something else? Teela was still typing away, seemingly oblivious to Adora again.

"Is everything okay?" Adora asked.

"No," Teela growled. Her brows furrowed again. She looked angry instead of concerned now.

"You're idiot brother is over there trying to talk to Catra."

Adora's face turned bright red. Adam was talking to–

She spun around in her barstool to look for Adam. Sure enough, he was at Catra's table. He was moving his hands animatedly. A large smile was etched on his face. Damn it, Adam!

Adora jumped off of her barstool and made her way to the table. She fought the urge to run. She didn't trust Adam to say anything that wouldn't embarrass her. Even in high school, he constantly tried to be her wingman and it rarely worked.

Scorpia was visibly texting on her phone. The purple-haired woman with the goggles was nodding along as Adam spoke excitedly. Every now and then, Adora would see her mouth move as if she were replying to whatever Adam was saying. Catra looked… bored. Her tail was flickering behind her. Every now and then, it would hit the wall. Her ears were leaning towards Adam. She had an elbow propped up on the table, her chin was being held by her palm.

As she neared the table, Adora was able to catch a few stray words from Adam.

"And… She's single! So really, it's the perfect match!" Adam explained excitedly.

The purple-haired woman clapped and turned her attention to Catra.

“He is right, Catra!” she agreed enthusiastically, “You were just complaining that you didn’t have a date for Scorpia’s wedding.”

Adam’s eyes lit up.

“Ah-ha! See! My sister would make the perfect plus one to a wedding!”

Catra’s other arm was folded on the table. Her fingers drummed against the worn wood. “I don’t think a wedding would be the appropriate space for a first date. And if she’s so great, why isn’t she asking me herself? Why did she send you?”

Her voice was like velvet. Shit, even her voice was beautiful! Adora was close enough now that she was able to grab Adam’s shoulder.

“Well– Ah!”

Adora sighed. Why did he always shriek like that? It was unexpectedly high-pitched.

“Well, here is my lovely sister! So she can answer any questions you have!” Adam gave a small bow to the table and tried to duck out from under Adora. She tightened her grip on his shoulder. No way was she going to let him leave.

“So…” Catra pushed herself away from the table, leaning back into her seat, her arms crossed over her chest. Her tail whipped behind her. “You’re the infamous sister?”

Catra’s gaze was on her. It was intense. Adora felt as if she were being studied. She noticed that Catra’s eyes were two different colors. Gold and blue. It was as if she were looking at both the sun and the moon.
“Adora!” Adam piped in, energetically.

Adora bit back a sigh. Where did Adam even get all of his energy?

“I’m not infamous,” Adora replied. What had Adam been telling this woman? This beautiful, gorgeous woman? Whatever shot Adora could have had with her was probably gone now.

“Infamous, Catra? Quite the opposite actually!” The purple-haired woman joined in. She looked over at Catra. “Didn’t you call the sister a ‘square’?”

Catra’s face reddened. She unfolded her arms and glared at the purple-haired woman. “Entrapta!” She chided.

“What?” Entrapta asked, giving Catra a quizzical look. Catra looked at Entrapta, her expression fluming.

“You know, you and this woman could go on a double date with me and Hordak!” Entrapta suggested enthusiastically. She started bouncing in her chair. The two long ponytails on her head seemed to dance. “That way, your first date wouldn’t be a wedding! And with it being a double date, it’s safer!” Entrapta’s eyes sparkled.

“Haha! See!” Adam added in, his voice brimming with gusto, “It’s perfect!”

Wait. What was going on? Adora’s grip on Adam’s shoulder loosened. He took the moment to slide out of her grasp and moved to stand next to her. He wrapped an arm around Adora and pulled her close.

“Well, we’ll let you ladies get back to your night!” Adam began to pull Adora away but then stopped suddenly. “Oh! I almost forgot!” He let go of Adora and rushed back to the table.

“Um…” His eyes scanned the table. Scorpia had stopped texting but she hadn’t said a word. Somehow she had managed to shrink into the background and had just been watching the whole exchange. Catra glanced away. Her eyes caught Adora’s. Her gaze seemed to soften. Adam made eye contact with Entrapta then.

“Do you uh… Have a piece of paper, by chance?”

“Oh! Of course!” Entrapta reached for something on the floor. She snatched a black backpack up off the ground and thrusted it onto the table. It made a large thud sound as it hit the table. Adora and Catra both glanced in Entrapta’s direction. Catra raised one of her eyebrows.

Entrapta unzipped the backpack and shuffled around in it. “Ah-ha!” She pulled a small notebook out and flipped through the pages. Math formulas and sketches of… where those machines?! They littered the pages. She finally reached a section of the notebook that was untouched and she tore a blank page out.

“Here you go!” She handed it to Adam.

“Thank you!” Adam scribbled quickly and furiously. Numbers… Wait! That was. Adam handed it back to Entrapta.

“You’ll make sure your friend gets this, right?” Adam winked at Entrapta and flashed her a smile.

Entrapta returned the smile and replied, “Of course!”

“Excellent!”

Adora cringed. She felt as if she could have died on the spot. Why? Why was Adam like this?

“Well, ladies!” He stretched an arm over his sternum and bowed. When he came back up, he added, “Good night!”

He walked backwards a few steps, until he reached Adora. When he reached her, he spun around and swung an arm around her shoulders and led her away.

“Adam…” She growled, “Why?”

“It looked like you needed a wingman, dear sister!”

Adora huffed. As they reached the bar, Adora noticed that Teela had been watching the whole thing, her cocktail in her hand, her lips just inches away from the straw.

“Well, that looked entertaining! Too bad I couldn’t hear anything.”

Adam ushered Adora to her seat before climbing into his own.

“You didn’t miss much,” he replied, reaching for his beer and taking a swig.

Buzz…

Buzz…

Adora felt her phone vibrate. She reached into her jacket pocket and fished her phone out. A text, from an unknown number…

Tomorrow night. 7pm. Here.

Adora stared at the screen in disbelief. She slowly looked up, glancing at the table Catra was at. The magicat made eye-contact with her. She flashed her phone for Adora and then turned her back to her. Did… Did that actually…?

Adora returned her attention to her phone and texted back:

Sounds good! See you then!
