Summary

It's been forty years since Horde Prime died, forty years since Catra and Adora's love saved the planet. Forty years of happiness, recovery and domestic bliss. All good things must come to an end, no one can escape the cold hands of death.

Night fell over Etheria like a dark cloak, magic buzzing in every inch of the environment. It covered the planet with a sickeningly sweet scent, enhancing everything from the flowers, to the trees, to the very air Catra was breathing in.

It was overwhelming, but nothing compared to the very reason everything was so bright, and fragrant and right. Her love, Adora's love, their love, love so powerful it healed Adora and the entire planet.

This was Catra's life. Everything felt like a vision, or maybe a dream, but it wasn't. It was real. All of it was real. Adora loved her so much she used that love to save everyone, including herself.

For the first time in three years, Adora stayed. Everything in the world was right again.

They were in Adora's bedroom at Brightmoon Palace, resting after the long trek they took halfway across Etheria to reach there. The blonde was leaning over the railing in the balcony, taking in all the little details of the gardens outside. Catra was lounging on Adora's bed, smiling to herself as she took in the beauty of her lover, relishing in this single moment where Adora was completely unguarded.

Maybe if everything kept going, she'd get to see this every day. She'd get to wake up to Adora's goofy smile and happy demeanor, and fall asleep to Adora's gentle words and affirmations, just like she always wanted.

Adora looked over her shoulder, grinning at Catra's dazed look.

“Hey…” She whispered, extending a hand in Catra's direction. “Come join me. See the world you've brought to life.”

Catra chuckled, but she pushed herself off the bed and took Adora's hand, letting the blonde pull her onto the balcony. “Me? Pretty sure you're the one who brought Etheria back to life with your rainbow She-Ra energy.” The feline responded, leaning against Adora and watching the trees and flowers sway in the breeze.

“But you saved me. If you hadn't saved me, none of us would be here…” Adora's voice was low, and sweet, and it tugged at Catra's heart in a way she just couldn't ignore. They gazed into each other's eyes, and for once, Catra didn't look away, instead she fell deeper. She didn't want to hold her feelings back, not when she spent her entire life up to this moment doing that.

They loved each other. Everything else was secondary to this moment.

Adora leaned forward and pressed her lips to Catra's in a slow, meaningful kiss. Everything faded away in an instant, and the feline's world was reduced to Adora. When they pulled away, Adora's eyes were glowing with untamed magic, blinding the feline almost immediately.

"God, princess. Dim your eyes a little." Catra complained as she looked away, still smiling, and still utterly breathless.

"Sorry, I just can't hold her back." Adora whispered, wrapping her arms around Catra's waist to pull her as close as humanly possible. "Is she making you uncomfortable?"

"Yes I'm deeply uncomfortable about the fact that you love me so much that you have to hold back your magic around me. The only thing remotely uncomfortable about this is that you keep blinding me, but then again your beauty has been doing that your whole life." Damn. Where did Catra get this confidence from? She was impressing herself.

Adora blushed and giggled, looking away and tucking some hair behind her ear. Catra's smile somehow grew wider at the sight of this dorky blonde that somehow fell in love with her of all people. How did Catra get so lucky?

Adora pressed her forehead against Catra's, sighing contentedly. "I don't want us to be apart again…" She whispered, and Catra's pulse shot up to medically concerning speeds.

"You'll have no complaints from me, wherever you're going, I'm coming with you." The feline responded, pulling away to look Adora in the eyes.

"You promise?"

"I promise, princess."

The world was waking up, people were going out into the fields, birds were chirping and calling out to their babies, bats were retreating into their caves, and now the feline's running out of more creative ways to describe this.

Catra was already awake. Adora had woken her up early and dragged her outside with the promise of an early breakfast and cuddles, and the feline didn't need more bribes than that. They were curled up together, Catra's head on Adora's lap while the blonde ran her hand through her hair, giving her gentle scratches behind her ear.

"I believe I was promised food." Catra whispered pointedly, turning around so that she could tuck her face in Adora's stomach, somehow purring louder than before.

"You kind of need to show me your face so that I can feed you for that to happen…" The feline chuckled, rubbing her cheek into Adora's shirt.

“Ugh, I'm so comfortable though…” She complained, her glance up at Adora apparently turning into cute kitty eyes because the blonde leaned down and began smooching her aggressively on the head.

“Scooch over please! We're crashing this date for family bonding!” Adora chuckled and looked over her shoulder to smile at the new arrivals. Finn, way too cheery and excited for this early hour, was carrying their husband in bridal style, plopping down beside Adora and adjusting their husband so that he was on their lap.

Jodi looked how Catra felt, completely exhausted and just barely awake. He was wrapped up in blankets and immediately tucked his face into Finn’s neck with a quiet grumble.

“Finn, baby, it's way too early.” Jodi mumbled, the words just barely audible.

“Exactly! So we can watch the sunrise!”

“The sunset is so much prettier, and doesn't require us waking up at ungodly hours.” Jodi lifted his head up to glare at Finn pointedly. “I don't understand how you can wake up so early and be this excited about it.”

“I know right? I swear, these two loved to torture me at early hours of the morning. I'm so glad I'm not alone in this anymore…” Catra extended a hand to Jodi, who shook it with great effort.

“Oh my god…” Adora mumbled, shaking her head while still smiling fondly. “Are you both ever going to stop ganging up on us?”

“No, you both would get very bored if we stopped.” Jodi responded, lifting his head up to smile cheekily at Finn. They smiled back, leaning down to give their husband a quick peck, before looking back up at the sky, purring quietly when Jodi tucked his head back against their neck.

Adora ran her hands through Catra's hair, looking utterly smitten at the sight of the feline curled up in her lap, like this was the first she was seeing it. It'd been years since the war ended, years since their love had saved the universe, but the passion never died, their feelings never faded, even when they were lesbian grannies, which Finn loved to call them.

“You still want that food you were demanding?” Adora whispered, cupping her cheek and tilting Catra's face so that they could make eye contact.

“Well, since you're asking so nicely…” The feline responded, turning to lay on her back so that the blonde could feed her, tail swaying eagerly.

Adora opened up the small basket she'd brought up with her, pulling out some grapes which she fed to the feline one by one, using her free hand to Catra scratches at the same time. The blonde’s hand shook as she fed her the grapes, and at first Catra didn't notice, not until Adora ended dropping it on the ground.

“Shit.” Adora whispered, shaking her head at her clumsiness.

“It's fine princess, just leave it.” Catra grabbed Adora's hand, immediately putting it back near her ears so that the blonde would get the hint and pet her. She did, and soon, both her and Finn were purring up a storm, the calming noise echoing in the small clearing they were seated in. Adora cooed over them as usual, and Jodi was finally starting to wake up to witness the sight of the purring kitties.

“Look! Look, it's starting!” Finn exclaimed excitedly, pointing at the sky and making Jodi jump in surprise. Adora leaned forward, smiling serenely at the sight of the dark sky turning to orange, but Catra wasn't looking at the sky. She watched as the light landed on Adora in all the right angles, turning her hair from its usual blonde and grey into gold and silver, and making her eyes glow like jewels. It'd been so many years since Catra was in her hopelessly pining for you phase, but she would never stop being blown away by Adora's beauty.

Adora noticed her watching, and she gave Catra a smug smirk. “We came here to watch the sunset.” She pointed out.

“So? I can multitask.” Catra responded with a shrug. The blonde giggled, tucking some hair behind her ear, before wrapping an arm around Catra's waist to pull her in for a kiss. The feline melted into it, just like she always did, and just like she did during their first kiss.

The sun shone down on them like a spotlight, the air around them stilled as if watching with bated breath as the two lovers pulled away, smiling and giggling like newlyweds as they pressed their foreheads together.

“I love you…”

“I love you too.”

When the sun finally reached its throne in the sky, Catra and Adora bid their child and their son in law goodbye and entered the castle. Catra held Adora's hand, both of them walking in silence as they observed every inch of the halls of the castle that they now knew like the back of their hand. Every little scratch carried memories, every room carried a meaning, every event carried a story, and the castle was their book.

Catra paused during their walk to admire the small flowers that were hanging from the ceiling beside the meeting room, thinking back to when Hyacinth had gotten into an argument with Finn and the hallway had suddenly exploded with flowers. Perfuma had managed to clear up most of it, but everyone insisted the flower on the ceiling stay for memories.

There was a little paint stain on one of the carpets of the lounge from when Finn and Edwina were painting together, a little scratch on the wall from when Finn was figuring out how to use their claws, a burn mark on the dining room table from when Edwina was trying to control her powers. Catra could go on and on with those memories, unable to forget such small and simple moments.

Adora might have felt the same, as they were crossing the fountain a hallway away from their bedroom, she watched Adora slow down, staring at the running water with a misty eyed look.

"Come on Catra, we're already super late for Prom, Scorpia will be crushed if we don't get there on time!" Adora rambled, turning her sword into a handheld mirror to check her reflection one final time. It was the perfect cover for Catra to go down on one knee behind her, smiling quietly while waiting for the blonde to turn around.

"Catra come on-" Adora paused when she noticed the feline, freezing as her eyes went wide.

"Hey Adora. It's been a while hasn't it?" The feline took Adora's hand, smiling hopefully. "I know we'll be together forever, but I just want to make it official, you know? I want everyone to know that you're stuck with me for the rest of your life. So, will you marry me?”

Adora covered her mouth as tears filled her eyes, Catra leaned down to kiss the blonde's hand gently, if only to hide her own tears.

“Yes! Yes I will!”

“Hey.”

Catra's voice made Adora jump, turning to look at the feline with wide eyes. The feline smiled, extending a hand to Adora.

“You coming?”

Adora grinned back, taking Catra's hand and allowing the feline to pull her back to their bedroom.

Catra opened the door, sighing happily at finally being in the comfort of their bedroom. She placed the picnic basket aside while Adora walked in, tripping just a little as she made her way to their bed.

The feline's eyes drifted across their room, to the little chalk drawings of herself, Adora, Finn and the new addition, Jodi. She looked over at the board above their work desk, filled with maps drawn by Adora, sketches of landscapes courtesy of Catra, and crayon stick figures of their little family made by Finn.

Melog growled beside her, bumping his head against her hip, knowing that she was getting sentimental.

“Hey, remember that time I took you on a date after our argument?” Catra asked, smiling sweetly at her wife. Adora had been overworking herself, as per usual, using She-Ra to keep herself from feeling the exhaustion. When the feline found out, she'd given the blonde a piece of her mind, but before they knew it, it'd blown up into a bad argument, one of their worst ones since the war, ending with the feline storming out of the room. It was not very healthy, considering she'd then left Adora alone till evening under the excuse that Adora needed some space to calm down.

“You mean your apology dinner? How could I forget? It was super cute.” They'd gathered together outside in the gardens, behind a curtain of leaves and flowers, eating together and talking out their argument. They stayed there late into the night, admiring the stars and whispering sweet nothings to each other.

It was special for another reason too. It was the night Adora told her she was pregnant. They'd cried all the way until they reached their room. It was an emotional day.

“Of course, nothing is cuter than when you offered water while I was in labor.” Ugh, did she have to remind Catra of that? The feline hadn't known what to expect from labor, and in hindsight, offering Adora water when she was screaming and pushing Finn out of her body has all the earmarks of a bad idea, but it's the thought that counts right?

“I don't know why you're complaining, I'm such a devoted wife.” Catra crossed her arms over her chest, pouting at the blonde in a way she knew the blonde wouldn't be able to resist. She was right, Adora immediately cooed and leaned forward to smother her with kisses.

Adora's knees buckled, the blonde gasping and grabbing onto Catra's shoulders to steady herself.

“Shit! You should sit down.” Catra wraps her arm around Adora's waist, leading her wife to the bed and helping her lay down. The blonde laid down on the bed, her head on Catra's lap.

“You're growing old, princess…” The feline teased, pulling off Adora's hair tie and running her hand through her golden locks, hints of silver shining in between.

“So are you…” Adora shot back, grabbing Catra's and gently kissing her knuckles. They stayed that way for a while, Adora's head in Catra's lap, Catra running her hands over her shoulders and her hair. Every now and then, Catra would lean down and kiss Adora's cheek, or neck slowly, relishing in having the blonde all to herself.

“People always think about the first time, you know?” Adora suddenly mumbled.

“What do you mean?” Catra asked her, combing through Adora's hair with her nails.

“They always talk about the first time something happened… But they don't really talk about the last time…”

“I’ll talk about the last time I got my period till the universe ceases to exist.” Catra joked, chuckling to herself, only to realise Adora hadn't joined her. The blonde was staring blankly at the floor, hugging herself tightly.

“Etheria to Adora, are you still with me Princess?” The feline scratched Adora's scalp gently, the blonde immediately leaning into the touch.

“Mhm… I am.” Adora whispers, voice softer than before, almost like she was tired. “I’m glad we watched the sunrise today with Finn and Jodi… I wish we could've done it more often.”

“They're not going anywhere dummy, I'm sure they'd love to watch the sunrise with us again tomorrow.”

“I'm sure they would, I don't know if I'll be there for it though…”

What does she mean, ‘not being there for it’… Wait.

Catra's eyes went wide as memories rearranged themselves to form a clear picture. Adora's struggle to walk, even stand up straight, random moments where she gasped for air, her shaky hands earlier that morning. Her wife was the most athletic person she knew. When did that change?

Oh no, oh god, Adora… oh my god Adora.

“I don't know if I'll make it till morning…” The blonde mumbled, leaning against Catra's thigh, eyes slipping shut. The feline gripped the blankets underneath, anger boiling inside her until she felt like a kettle ready to explode.

“Why didn't you fucking say something?! I could've called a doctor! A sorcerer!” She screamed. How could she do that to her?! After everything they'd been through she was hiding the fact that she was about to die from her.

“It's too late for me, Catra. There's no point, no one is going to be able to help me…” Adora whispered, eerily calm despite everything.

“No, no. Y-You can't go, you can't! Finn’s so young! They're just thirty! They have so much to l-live for, Adora you can't leave!” It's too early, everyone was still here, they couldn't be the first to go, they can't leave, it's too early!

“You know what, just wait here, I'll go call a doctor. I-I'm going to get you help okay?!” Catra laid Adora down on the bed, getting up to go to the door and find a guard, when she felt a hand grab her wrist. The feline turned around to see Adora, just barely conscious, holding her wrist in a feather light grip.

“Catra, please.”

“No. N-No you can't go. I'm not letting you go! I'm going to get you help.” Catra insisted, blinking back tears desperately.

“Catra. It's too late. By the time you come back with doctors… I'll be gone.”

“No!” Catra wrenched her hand away. “You can't fucking do that to me!” She screamed, louder this time, not caring about the fact that Adora flinched at her tone.

“I'm sorry…” Adora hid her face in the bedsheets. What more could she say? Catra wrapped her arms around herself, tears streaming down her face as she watched the blonde curl in on herself.

This can't be the end, after everything they'd been through, Adora couldn't be the first to go. It was supposed to be Catra.

"You can leave me alone, it'll hurt less." Adora suggested, weakly gesturing to the door.

No. No. Absolutely not.

Catra was angry, so angry, but that didn't mean Adora would have to die alone just so it would 'hurt less'. If anything, Adora dying alone with no one to comfort her would gut Catra.

"Don't be fucking delusional. Whatever happens, I'm staying with you." Her heart screamed, her eyes were red already, but she got into bed with Adora, pulling the blonde into her arms so that she had her head on Catra's chest to hear her heartbeat.

Adora hummed, hugging Catra as tight as she possibly could, her breathing slowing down as Catra started to purr, hoping to provide some sort of comfort to the blonde in her final moments.

She wanted to run to the door, scream for help, ask for just a few more days with Adora, but in the end, Adora needed her over doctors during her final moments. After everything she'd been through, she deserved it.

“Can you sing for me?” Adora's voice was so quiet, Catra's magicat hearing could barely catch it.

“Anything for you, Adora.” The feline pressed a kiss to her forehead, before clearing her throat.

“You are my sunshine, my only sunshine, you make me happy when skies are gray…” The feline's voice echoed in their room, her grip on her wife tightening as she sang for her one last time. Somehow, her voice didn't crack, she didn't burst into tears, all of it was worth it when she felt the blonde relax against her, finally at peace.

As she came to the final chorus, Catra pressed her forehead against Adora's, wishing in her heart that she'd had more time to say goodbye, but now, all she could hope was that in her final moments, Adora had felt safe and happy.

“I love you…” Catra mumbled, smiling at the blonde.

She didn't get a response.

Catra gripped her wife, an inhuman cry escaping her as she finally cried.

It took her some time, but eventually, she called Glimmer and Bow to her room to tell them the news. Before she could even blink, Glimmer had summoned the Brightmoon doctors to her bedside. Catra didn't even glance at them. Like Adora said, it was too late.

The doctors were hovering around her wife, trying to find her pulse in every way they could think of, taking her wrist, checking with their stethoscopes. Catra didn't like it. She wanted her wife to finally rest.

The door burst open, Finn, Jodi and Edwina, all still in their pyjamas coming in and freezing at the sight of all the doctors surrounding Adora. Everyone watched Finn for a few seconds as they processed the scene, before crumbling to their knees and screaming in agony.

"No! No this can't be happening! S-She was… she was fine this morning! We watched the sunrise together and she was okay!" Finn insisted, Jodi simply nodding and pulling his spouse into his arms.

"I know, I know Finn… I'm sorry." Edwina leaned down and joined the hug, her gentle voice slowly soothing Finn to an extent. They looked up at Glimmer, fur matted with tears, eyes pleading.

"Y-You can't help her right? You can save her… Please Auntie Glimmer." They begged, shaking visibly as their eyes went over to Adora lying peacefully on the bed.

“She can't help.”

Everyone's gaze turned to Catra, still standing beside the balcony. A younger version would've hated the direct attention, but now, Catra didn't even glance at her audience.

“She can't help her, Finn. Adora's gone.” Catra whispered, hands moving downwards to fiddle with her robe, just to give herself something to do.

“NO!” Finn wrenched themselves away from Jodi, wailing in pain while tugging at their hair. Edwina panicked, grabbing Finn’s hands and pulling them into her own, whispering gentle, kind words to her friend, but Finn didn't listen. They continued to scream, calling out to Adora and begging her to come back.

Catra watched the trees swaying outside in the garden, ears permanently hidden in her hair, mind far away from the scene she was given front row seats too. Her soul felt like it had split into two, broken like glass, and now she couldn't pick up the pieces. Doctors were still hovering around her wife, touching her and ‘helping’ her, and Catra couldn't help the snarl that escaped her.

“I want everyone out.” She ordered, throwing everyone in the room an angry look.

“Catra- We're trying to help…” Glimmer whispered.

“There's nothing you can do to help. My wife is gone. No matter how much they shove stethoscopes to her chest, she isn't coming back. I want to grieve, and I want everyone out.”

Glimmer looked like she wanted to argue, but Bow and Edwina slowly led her out, Finn and Jodi following close behind along with the parade of doctors. When the door closed, Catra crumbled to the floor, curling up into a ball as a sob wracked her chest.

Just a few hours ago, she and Adora were laughing together, the sunrise spreading a gentle warmth through them. How have things changed so fast? It wasn't fair. It wasn't fair.

“Adora…” Catra called out, wishing the blonde would get up and pull her into a hug, telling her it would be okay because she didn't know how to move on.

Adora wasn't coming back. Catra didn't want to accept it, she was supposed to go first, not Adora. The blonde would've moved on, it would've taken time but she would've moved on. She would've stayed with Finn and comforted them, made them laugh and smile through all of it.

Catra was angry, she was violent, she was pushing everyone away. She closed herself off from everyone and made her cocktail of emotions everyone's problem. She wished she could be different, be good, but she couldn't. Her world was ending, and she didn't know how to put it back together.

Catra didn't leave her room. They'd taken Adora away later the same day, and the feline finally had the room to herself to breathe and process everything.

On the first day, she was curled up in the corner of her room, knees pressed close to her chest, rocking back and forth, either in a state of shock, or breaking down loud enough for everyone down the hall to hear. She scratched up all the walls she could reach, screaming at the world in anger at having lost her wife.

This wasn't supposed to happen. She was meant to go first, that way Finn would have a stable parent to look after them. Catra wasn't equipped to help, even after years of therapy, Adora was just always better at that. No, they were stuck with Catra, who couldn't even handle her own emotions.

The second day, she was curled up under her blankets, bedsheets stained with her tears. She refused food, stating plainly that she wasn't hungry. She didn't allow any visitors, hissing when anyone did enter her room. Catra didn't want anyone seeing her like this, she was an utter mess.

Melog didn't leave her side, not for one moment. She knew they could feel all her emotions, and was likely just as depressed as Catra was. At first she hated having them around, but slowly, she came around, feeling just a little less alone when they were curled up beside her.

Eventually, it needed to end. She had duties to attend to, a family she needed to check on. On the third day, she pushed herself out of her bed, brushing her teeth, taking a quick shower, before slipping into dark clothes appropriate for someone in mourning. Everyone was caught off guard when she stepped into the dining room, looking like she hadn't slept at all.

"Catra! Hi…" Glimmer greeted cautiously. She and Bow looked just as exhausted as Catra felt, and the feline felt a pang of jealousy. How were they holding it together so well? Catra was such a mess.

The feline glanced around the room. Edwina was in the corner grabbing food for herself, yet Jodi and Finn were nowhere to be found.

"Where's Finn?" Catra asked Edwina, moving over to grab some breakfast.

"I haven't seen them. Jodi comes to get lunch and dinner for them, beyond that, Finn has kept their distance from us." The young queen responded, taking a seat at the table to look through her documents for the day.

Catra grabs a second plate, loading it with enough food for both Jodi and Finn to share. “I'll go check on them…” Catra informs the family, before slipping out of the room, making her way to her kid's bedroom.

Jodi was the one to open the door, blinking when he realised it was Catra, holding two plates of breakfast. “Can I come in?” She asked gently.

Jodi looked over his shoulder at his spouse, possibly to get permission, before opening the door wider to let Catra inside. The feline handed one plate to her son in law, before pulling a chair for herself to sit beside her little one.

“Babe… Come on, your mom's here to see you. She brought sandwiches too!” Jodi got under the blankets, one hand wrapping around Finn’s waist as he tried to coax his spouse out. The feline groaned, but they did reluctantly leave their blanket raccoon.

Somehow, Finn managed to look worse than Catra did, sporting dark eye bags and looking like they cried all night, which they probably did if Catra was any indication. They reached for one of the sandwiches, nibbling it while leaning over to cuddle Jodi.

“Hi Finn.” Catra greeted them cautiously, smiling gently at her little kitten. Her kid glanced over at her, eyes watering at the sight of their mom.

“She was fine.” They insisted, like they did the day it happened. “She was okay, she watched the sunrise with us. What happened?”

Catra inhaled, her tail swaying behind her, thinking about her words carefully. Finn deserved to know, yet, no matter the years that passed, the feline still felt like Finn was her sweet baby who needed to be protected from the dangers and pain of the world.

No, they were an adult, they deserved to know the truth.

“I know it seemed that way, but the truth is that… your mom knew that would be her last day from the moment she woke up. That's why she took me to see the sunrise. She wanted to spend her last few hours with us happily.” Tears were slipping down her face, Catra placed her plate aside and grabbed her kid’s hands, squeezing it gently.

“It made her so happy when the two of you joined us, she got to spend her final sunrise with the people she loved the most. You, me, and Jodi.” Her son-in-law was caught off guard, apparently not expecting to come in the list, glancing at the floor to probably hide his tears. Finn immediately pulled Catra into a hug, burying his face into her neck, the feline’s fur immediately getting soaked with their tears.

“I m-miss her so much… I didn’t think I’d- I didn’t t-think she’d g-go like this. I miss her mama…” They mumbled in between their bouts of tears. Catra simply nodded, knowing intimately how her kid felt.

“I know baby…” She tilted her head to press a kiss to their head. “I miss her too.”

It took twenty minutes for Finn to calm down and pull away, picking their sandwich back up and eating it in silence.

“We’ll have friends coming over and seeing us soon. Are you comfortable meeting them? You can say no, I won’t be mad. I’ll meet them on my own.” Catra said carefully. Her child had a choice in the matter, she didn’t want to push them into something, especially when they weren’t in the most stellar mental state.

“No. No, I'm not letting you do it alone. Besides, it’ll just be members of the alliance. Meeting them might make me feel better. I do miss Hyacinth and the others.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yes. I’m sure. I want to meet them.” Finn insisted, a determined look on their face that broke Catra.

"I promised to take you home and that's exactly what I'm going to do."

"Mom? Are you okay?" Catra looked at Finn, but all she could see was Adora. Her sweet blue eyes haunted the feline through their child.

"I'm fine, baby. If you want to meet them, make sure to take a shower. I know from personal experience that you've probably not left your bed. Jodi, make sure they shower okay?" Jodi cracks a quick smile at Catra.

"Don't worry ma'am, they'll be clean and presentable." He ruffled Finn's hair, and much to Catra's and Jodi's relief, they giggled and tackled Jodi to the bed.

Catra had done that, somehow, she'd spoken to Finn, comforted them. She didn't know how, but she did it. She didn't fail miserably like she thought she would. A sense of relief spread through Catra as she watched her kid laugh and nuzzle their husband, finally seeming like the gentle, happy child the feline had come to love.

Somehow Adora, we'll be okay.

-ᐱᔨᔨ-ᐱᔨ♡-ᐱᔨᔨ-ᐱᔨ

Just as Catra predicted, the afternoon was occupied by alliance members coming to convey their condolences to Catra and her family. It was so hard, but Catra noticed how Finn's mood improved around their friends.

"Okay. We've come prepared with a mood improving kit for you!" Rhys and Hyacinth placed a box onto the lounge sofa, opening it and pulling out a few stuffed animals along with bags of candy.

"Oh my god, guys you didn't have to do this!" Finn insisted, blushing and smiling at the efforts their friends had put in for them.

"I know, but we wanted to." Raelyn responded, sitting down beside her brothers while leaving space in the center for Finn. "Now come and eat some candy with us!" Her kid immediately flopped down in between the group, Jodi joining Eliott in the corner as the two spoke in whispers, probably about a few other surprises the group had planned for Finn.

"How have you been, Catra?" Perfuma asked her kindly.

"Do you want me to lie?" The feline joked, giving the blonde a smile that didn't quite reach her eyes. Perfuma waited patiently for Catra to start talking, knowing full well by now that this was just how Catra coped.

“I’ve been… so lost these last two days. I didn’t think she’d go this early. I mean, we’re only sixty years old, I thought we’d have a long time together. It was so sudden too… I didn’t even have time to properly process what was happening.”

Catra ran a hand through her hair, exhaling quietly as memories of that morning came flooding back. “S-Sometimes… I feel like I’ll turn the corner and she’ll be there, but she’s not. Other times I expect to wake up with her, and then it hits me that she’s gone, and she’s never coming back.”

Tears threatened to spill down her face, again, and the feline hurriedly went to wipe them away. The world felt so odd with Adora gone, she’d been a constant throughout Catra’s life, and to suddenly lose her like this, the feline didn’t know how she’d ever be able to move on.

“I miss her, I miss her so much. She was my… everything, Perfuma, my whole life… and now she's gone, and I don't know what to do. I’m neck deep in grief, but I need to be there for Finn, I just can't leave them…” She brought her knees to her chest, tucking her face into them as she tried to cover up her tears.

How do you move on from this? How do you process this? How do you accept that the person who you promised your life to is just… gone? Catra loved, and loved, and loved, and now her wife is gone, and she still has so much love to give.

Perfuma understood that Catra needed space, so she got up and went to join her wife. The feline was surprised that Scorpia hadn't come to crush her in a hug yet, but she appreciated that everyone was smothering her. She didn't want it, she needed space to process, to understand and to finally accept.

One Week Later

Catra was so tired. She'd been sluggish all week, with barely enough energy to get up in the morning. It started slow, she was dizzy, sleepy, and now that it had been one week since Adora's passing, Catra felt like shit. She had no clue how she managed to push herself out of bed, but she did. She showered, got dressed, and left the room to find her kid and her son-in-law.

They were curled up together in the lounge, a plate of breakfast in between them, duelling with their forks while wrestling for the last bite of their pancake. It was small, something Catra wouldn't have noticed before, but it made Finn smile and giggle, eyes glittering in an all too familiar way that made the feline's heart clench.

"Go get your own plate!" Adora pulled her plate away from Catra, the feline pouncing on her and pinning her to the chair.

"I'm sorry, didn't you just say in your vows yesterday that whatever is yours is also mine?" Catra countered, grinning like a cat that caught the canary while trying to reach for the blonde's food.

"Food doesn't come in that, and I'm sure you know that."

“Wow princess, denying your wife food? What an awesome partner you are.”

“You can go and get your own plate, now shoo! I'm trying to eat.” Adora's eyes bore into her soul, a childish joy in them that Catra hadn't seen in so long. It filled her with a sense of peace, and pride to be the one who brought out that side of her. How did she get so lucky?

“Mama? Are you okay?” Catra snapped back into reality. Finn was looking over their shoulder, big blue eyes giving her a worried look.

“Yeah, I'm alright.” She whispered, smiling at them before moving over to take a seat in one of the other empty couches.

Almost like they could sense her presence, Glimmer and Bow entered the lounge, much to Catra's dismay. The couple had been trying their level best to talk to the feline, but Catra had no such desires. She wanted space, peace, but they spoke of Adora's accomplishments, all the things she did to benefit Etheria, as though it would make Catra feel better.

Spoiler alert: It did not.

“Heeyy Catra!” Bow greeted, giving her a quick smile that the feline didn't reciprocate. “How are you today?”

“No different than yesterday Arrow boy. I cried a little this morning because I saw one of Adora's socks in the laundry basket though, so that's new.” Catra wished she was lying, but unfortunately she wasn't. Everyday she was getting unique reminders of that fact that she was now a widow, and somehow it was worse every single time.

Glimmer and Bow fell uncomfortably silent at Catra's admission, and the feline, not wishing to hear any pity words from them, got up and turned to her kid.

“I'm going on a walk to Thaymor to get some fresh air and all that. D’you want to join me?” She asked Finn and Jodi, who immediately nodded and got up, probably wanting to leave the situation as well.

“Would you mind if we came along as well?” Glimmer asked, seeming surprisingly polite about it. Normally she would just barge in, no questions asked, but being a mother changed her.

Finn glanced at their mother, asking without words if she would mind Glimmer and Bow joining.

“...fine. You can come along.”

The joy on their faces knew no bounds, and the two of them immediately gushed to Finn about how Thaymor was the place where Adora first transformed into She-Ra. Finn's eyes lit up with excitement, but Catra remained silent. To them, it was the first place blessed by She-Ra, but it was the beginning of Catra's three years of pain and suffering.

“Come on.” Catra growled, pushing past them and walking into the hallway. “Let's go.” Finn and Jodi glanced at each other, clearly worried about Catra, but they didn't say anything, following her wordlessly.

ᓚᘏᗢ♡ᓚᘏᗢ

Thaymor was completely different from what it was when Adora defected. For one, it was filled with untamed magic that had Catra's fur tingling. Flowers were bursting out of every small spot, their fragrance once intolerable to Catra's heightened senses, but after nearly forty years, the feline was now used to it, and even enjoyed it.

People were more welcoming too, no longer sprinting away at the sight of the feline, even offering her a genuine smile, which the feline unfortunately didn't have the energy to return, still sluggish and dizzy from exhaustion.

They entered the town square, Finn immediately pulling Jodi aside to point at an adorable bunny plush. They were a lot better nowadays, still grieving and struggling with the loss of Adora, but Finn had adjusted into a new normal without her.

"She's gone, but not really. I know she's still with me somewhere, and that's okay." Catra heard her kid telling Jodi a few days back.

They hadn't healed completely, Catra still caught them crying when something reminded them or Adora, but they were settling, and Catra was so proud of them. If only she could be proud of herself the same way.

"Oh I remember when they built that…" Bow pointed at the center of town square, Catra's heart dropping when she realised what it was. It was a massive statue of She-Ra, covered with vines and flowers from the magic burst of the heart. It was one of the first statues to be built. Catra hadn't understood the reason behind it when it was made forty years ago after the war, and still didn't, even now.

Something was different about it. At She-Ra's feet, there were so many gifts, flowers, letters, and even small dolls. Catra remembered Glimmer mentioning that people were leaving things in honor of She-Ra after her death was announced, a sort of memorial.

"She was so brave, remember Catra? She would do so much for the people of Etheria… Charities, construction." Bow smiled wistfully, glancing up at the statue. "The impact she left on Etheria through her accomplishments can't be measured."

"Yeah. She did so much not only for the Etherians, but for us as well. She was a hero, in every sense of the word." Glimmer responded, a gentle grin as she glanced back at the statue of She-Ra.

Catra couldn't take it anymore.

"Great! Fantastic! I'm so glad that you remember all her accomplishments as She-Ra. It makes me so fucking happy that even in death, no one remembers Adora! Just She-Ra!" She screamed, rounding on her friends while snarling.

"Catra-"

"Stop! Just fucking stop! She was more than She-Ra! She was my wife! Your best friend! Finn's mother! She was the woman who stayed up with Finn all night when they were throwing up. She was the woman who sat beside you when Glimmer was in labor, Bow. She was the sweet, loving partner who held me through all my suicidal moments, even if it left her sleep deprived, and then walk me to my therapy sessions the next day just to make sure I was okay! She was the hopeless cook who still learnt how to bake, even if she could burn water unsupervised, just because Finn asked for cookies!"

Catra was gasping for air, eyes switching between Glimmer and Bow who were gaping wordlessly at her. She felt so lightheaded, like she may faint any second now, but she couldn't stop unloading the week's worth of emotions onto them.

"That is the Adora I'm grieving for. Who are you two grieving for?"

It was such a cruel thing to say, but it felt so good. Anyway, it was now out in the open, Catra couldn’t take it back.

“What’s going on?”

Catra whipped around to see Jodi and Finn standing behind them, Finn clutching the white stuffed bunny close to their chest, ears drooping as they immediately understood that Catra, Glimmer and Bow were arguing.

“I need some s-space Finn, you guys return to the palace.” Catra whispered, pushing past everyone and sprinting into the forest without waiting for a response. It didn’t matter, no one called out to her anyway.

-ᐱᓬᐱᓚ♡-ᐱᓬᐱᓚ

Catra was no longer the agile beast she was in her youth. She could’ve run for hours and never felt the exhaustion since she was running on anger and sheer spite, but she wasn’t that person anymore. A few minutes into the forest and she was already gasping for air, leaning against the trees as her vision became blurry, the green and brown blending into a nauseating, muddy mess of colours.

Fuck. Shouldn't have run. Catra collapsed to the ground, her world spinning and shaking as she tried to take air into her lungs, going into a full on panic attack when she couldn't take in the air she needed.

This is it! This is how I die, alone, lost in the woods, no one will find me, I'll be gone for good, oh god, oh god!

Catra tried to push herself up, get herself to walk so that she could reach safety, but her feet went crashing to the ground, a desperate sob escaping her at her failed attempt.

No no no! Finn can't lose me too! Breathe in… breathe out.

Catra tried those breathing exercises Perfuma taught her, but it was like her lungs were rejecting air. She grasped her chest, sobbing louder which only made her predicament worse.

Please, please! I can't leave Finn!

The forest fell eerily silent, not even a bird made a noise. The wind slowed, almost directing itself towards Catra, swirling around her in a motion that felt… comforting, almost intimate. The feline gasped for air, finally feeling a sense of relief as she started to breathe again. The flora around her began to lean closer, vines wrapping around her hand like it was trying to hold it, staying close as she breathed in and out.

When she finally calmed down, she looked around herself to find the plants and flowers clinging to her, almost reluctant to let go. The breeze felt anxious with the way it hovered around her, and when Catra tried to get up, it seemed nervous, ready to help her if she fell. The feline was okay, she managed to stand, her legs were stable now. The breeze calmed down, Catra however, was confused because what the fuck?! How is the breeze alive?

"Well hello dearie! I did not think I would see you here!" Catra looked up, sighing in relief at the sight of Razz, old and kooky as always.

"Hi Razz…" The feline greeted, giving the old woman a fond smile.

"Come now! We have lots to do, and pies to bake!" Razz's staff came down on her head, but after years, Catra had come to accept it, and get used to it. Still so exhausted, she walked slowly behind the woman, unable to keep up with her, but she was willing to try.

It was like the forest could sense her exhaustion, the flowers tried to reach after her, the breeze swirling with unchecked anxiety, just in case something happened to Catra. Razz seemed to pick up on it, but she didn't seem unsettled, instead, she smiled.

"Oh! Adora dearie is here too!" She cheered happily.

Huh??

“No, Razz, she’s gone. She’s dead.” Catra reminded her, the words painful to even say.

“How could she be? She’s everywhere!” The feline just shook her head, rubbing her forehead and sighing. She did not have the energy to deal with Glimmer and Bow, let alone Razz.

“Razz she’s gone.” She growled, bordering on dangerous, but the old woman didn’t get it.

“Adora is never truly gone, you pumpkin! She’s She-Ra!” Razz responded like that explained anything. Catra gave her a deadpan expression, the old woman pouting when she realised she needed to give her a proper explanation.

“Adora’s sword connected her to the planet, so when she died, her soul joined the planet’s magic! She’s everywhere now dearie, and right now, she wants to be beside you…”

The breeze pulsed around her, like it was agreeing with Razz, and Catra felt a sense of peace.

Adora… oh. You’re here.

She sat down, leaning against a tree, tears streaming down her face, finally feeling safe after a week of turmoil. Exhaustion ached in her bones, begging for the world to set Catra free, to let her join her love, and finally, it clicked.

I'm dying too…

Somehow, that made her cry louder. Catra can't go, she can't leave Finn. They just lost Adora, they couldn't lose her too! No. No no no. She needed to live, she needed to stay for them. Finn couldn't lose them too.

"Oh dearie…" Razz whispered, shuffling over to her. "You need to let go, it's time."

"No. No no no. Razz I can't go… My Finn…"

"They will be okay! Dearie, they aren't alone."

"It won't be the same, Razz, they need me…" Catra insisted. They lost one mom, they couldn't lose her too.

"But you will leave eventually, it is inevitable. They will face that pain eventually…"

"But it doesn't have to be now! They just lost Adora, and then if I leave…" Catra pushed herself up, swaying like a leaf in the wind. "Why does no one understand it?! It's inevitable, but it doesn't have to be now! My child needs me!"

"I know… But you need to rest. You have been through so much dearie, you deserve to rest. Adora is waiting for you too…" The breeze swirled around Catra in response.

The feline grabbed the tree to steady herself, fur matted with her tears. Razz was right, despite how much she hated it. She probably wouldn't survive the night with her condition. At the very least, she needed to return to her kid so that her last night would be with them. They deserved that at least.

"I will see you tomorrow for pie!" Razz told Catra as she shuffled out of the forest, but the feline didn't register it.

I need to return home.

-ᐱᓚᓗᐱ♡-ᐱᓚᓗᐱ

By the time Catra returned home, night had settled upon Etheria like a blanket. She stumbled into the shower, turning on the hot water to get the dirt and mud of the forest off of her. She was still dizzy, still exhausted, but she was pushing herself to stay active, worried that if she fell asleep, she may never wake up.

She got dressed into a comfortable shirt and a pair of pants, brushing out her hair with her claws before deciding to go and search for Finn and Jodi. Catra made her way to the lounge, only to find Glimmer and Bow sitting there.

Oh my god, I just can't escape them.

Glimmer and Bow immediately got up. “Catra. Why don't you sit with us?” Bow suggested, gesturing to the empty seat on the couch. The feline wanted to be petty and refuse, but she didn't want to go without resolving something with the couple. She'd known them for so long, first as Adora's friends, but they were her friends too. So, with a sigh, Catra sat down beside them.

For a few minutes, they were silent, Catra keeping her gaze on the floor while fiddling with her hands. It was Bow who broke the silence.

“We're so sorry Catra…” He whispered, wrapping an arm around Glimmer to pull her closer. “It's been hard for all of us and… we should've known you wouldn't have wanted to listen to that anyway… It's how we grieve, but it's not how you grieve.”

Catra's ears perked up, eyes wide as she took in Bow’s apology. She could already feel herself tearing up, and she swallowed to hold in her emotions. Bow was no better, but he didn't hide it, letting his tears run free down his face.

“Adora always wanted to do good in the world, it was what she wanted. It's just… hard, knowing that she's gone and that we'll never get to tell her that she did it, she succeeded in doing good in the world. We want her to know that we're proud of her, all of us, but we'll never get to tell her.” Glimmer went on when she realised her husband was in no position to continue. “We shouldn't have just… laid it on you like that, Catra. We're so sorry…”

They're Adora’s friends too, close friends. Of course they're grieving, you're not the only person who lost someone.

Catra felt like shit now, she'd been so awful to them when they were also grieving the loss of Adora. She moved over to hug them, surprising not only the couple, but herself as well.

“I'm sorry too, I didn't even consider what you guys were going through…” Catra mumbled, already hearing them squeal in response. They hugged Catra back tightly, the feline feeling Bow’s eyes go wide with joy when she began to purr gently.

They stayed that way for a while, Catra curled up in between Glimmer and Bow, purring quietly while the couple sat in silence with her.

“Remember how Adora used to sleep-fight?” Glimmer suddenly asked, and Catra started to laugh at the memory.

“She could never relax. Oh I would have to physically lay down on her to get her to stay still… And even that wasn't enough! She still managed to kick me off the bed once.” When it happened, she'd been annoyed by the blonde's inability to relax, but now, she looked upon the memory with fondness. In the end, Adora was a dumbass, yeah, but she was her dumbass.

“She was so sentimental too… Adora used to hold on to Finn's baby clothes and toys, she said she wasn't ready for them to grow up.” Catra recounted, tail wagging at that memory.

“Adora…”

“I want them to be my little baby forever.” Adora whined, holding the tiny sock close to her heart.

“Adora, they’ll always be our little baby. No matter how old Finn grows, they'll always be our baby.” Catra sat down in front of Adora, taking the blonde's hands into her own and pressing her forehead against Adora's.

“You promise?”

“I promise dummy.”

“She was an angel, no one in the world could be as sweet as Adora…” Bow agreed, rubbing Catra's back when he realized the feline was about to cry again. She didn't hold back this time. She tucked her face into Bow’s neck and bawled her eyes out, the week’s emotions pouring out of her the only way it knew how to. Catra cried for minutes on end, and by the time she calmed down, she was gasping for air, finally feeling a weight lift off her chest.

“Mama! You're home!” The feline looked up, immediately smiling when she realised it was her kid. Finn ran over to her, wrapping their arms around her shoulders and pulling her into a hug.

“Yeah, I'm home baby…” Catra tucked her face into Finn's hair, melting at the familiar scent of her kid's shampoo.

“Where's Jodi?” Glimmer asked Finn as her kid flopped down beside the sparkly woman, laying their head down on her lap.

“Jodi and Edwina are handling some court business together, so I decided to join you guys here.” Finn responded, nudging their head into Glimmer's hand, immediately getting the scratches they wanted.

As Finn’s purrs echoed in the room, something sank into Catra's mind, a sort of realisation.

“Dearie, they aren't alone.”

Razz was right. Finn had a lot of people beside them. They had Jodi, Edwina, the rest of the alliance children, and of course, all the alliance members. Catra was weak, and she wouldn't survive the night. There was no point delaying the inevitable, Finn would suffer in the end anyway. They wouldn't suffer alone though. They would always have someone beside them, guiding them through the oceans of grief.

For now, however, Catra melted into the cuddle pile, enjoying the body heat of everyone around her, letting her purrs join her kid's, creating a comforting rumble in the room. Eventually, Jodi and Edwina joined in, complaining lightheartedly about being left out before squeezing in between the group to join in on the snuggles.

-ʌ,,-ʌ,♡-ʌ,,-ʌ,

By the time Catra returned to her room, it was past midnight. The exhaustion was a part of her now, her eyes were begging to fall shut. This was the end, and despite what she expected, Catra wasn't scared. Weirdly, she felt peaceful. Was this how Adora felt when she knew the end was here? She hoped that's how she felt.

Catra moved over to the window, throwing it open to allow the wind into her room, before making her way to her bed, leaning down to blow out the candle at her beside, plunging the room in darkness. She curled up on the bed, pulling the blanket onto her, making a sort of cocoon for herself in the blankets. It was peaceful, safe, just how Catra wanted it to be.

The feline wondered if she'd feel herself leaving, if it would feel different, or if it would be like falling asleep, only this time she'd never wake up. It didn't matter in the end, the end result was the same. She'd be reunited with Adora, and this time, they would never part ways.

Catra felt a breeze blow into her room, unusually strong for this hour, only she knew it wasn't the breeze. The wind swirled around her, a comforting and gentle feeling, almost feeling like a hug. Adora was here, not in person, but in spirit, ready to sit beside the feline as she joined her in the afterlife.

“Hey Adora… I'm coming…” Catra whispered, smiling in her sleep as she felt the breeze pulse around her.

Slowly, her world darkened as she slipped into sleep for the last time, her sense of time disappeared, and Catra wasn't scared, she was peaceful. Her wife was waiting for her, and together, they would finally be able to escape everything they'd been through.

I'm coming to you Adora… I'm coming.

-ᐱᓬᐱᓬ♡-ᐱᓬᐱᓬ

It was almost ten in the morning, breakfast had concluded a long time back, yet their mama had not shown up. Finn wasn't worried, she was probably sleeping in. Goodness, their mama deserved it after the bad week.

They grabbed a plate for them, loading it up with pancakes and scrambled eggs, their mama’s favorites, before grabbing a glass of orange juice.

“Jodi! D’you want to join me? I'm taking breakfast to my mama.” Finn called out to their partner, who was seated beside Edwina, helping her with some resource allocations.

“Yeah sure. I'll come along.” Jodi responded, getting up and joining Finn's side, holding their hand as they walked over to Catra's room.

They opened the door slowly so as to not startle their mother, smiling to find her still curled up under the blankets, sleeping peacefully.

“Come on mama, you're still asleep?” Finn asked teasingly, moving over to her bedside table and placing the food there before sitting down next to her, slowly rubbing her arm. Surprisingly, she didn't wake up, which was weird. Their mama was a light sleeper, she woke up to the lightest of sounds.

“Mama, get up! I've brought you breakfast.” They said, a little louder this time so that Catra would wake up. The feline didn't respond, she didn't even move in response to Finn's words.

“Mama? Mama?!” The panic was setting in now. Finn, utterly alarmed at the lack of Catra's responses, grabbed their mom and turned her around, shaking her aggressively hoping she'd give some sort of reaction. Their mother flopped around uselessly in response to Finn’s shaking, and the silence was so strong the feline could hear their own panicked heartbeat.

“Mama! Mama get up!” Jodi joined from the other side, trying to find a way to wake Catra up. He grabbed the feline's hand, only to go completely still. His wide eyes and stone cold expression made Finn freeze.

“J-Jodi…?”

They locked eyes with their husband, gasping for air as they wished Jodi wouldn't look at them like that, like tragedy had struck in their life again.

“Jodi what's going on?!” Finn demanded, a pleading tone entering their voice. Please, please no more bad news, I can't- I can't handle anymore!

“Finn…” Their husband whispered, so quiet not even Finn's magicat hearing could catch it. “Finn, she doesn't have a pulse.”

No…

“No… N-No, no no no! No that's not true. My mama’s here with me, she's here! She wouldn't leave, she wouldn't, she wouldn't, not after mom left too.” Finn insisted, grabbing their mama’s hand, bringing it up to their chest.

“Mama, come on, you have to wake up. They made your favorite breakfast, blueberry pancakes. You wouldn't miss it, come on mama!” They begged, tears slipping down their face. Catra can't leave too, not after Adora left.

Come on mama…

“Mama please! Please get up!” They were screaming now, guards were bursting down the door, Edwina right behind them, alarmed by all of it. Finn’s tears were staining Catra's hand as they released broken pleading through their sobs, most of it now incoherent as they begged their mama to wake up. They felt like a little child, begging their mother for something, only this time it was their life.

Finally, after realising how hopeless the situation was, Finn felt Catra's wrist, hoping for a pulse, but they were met with nothing.

“Mama!” They screamed, their voice bouncing off of the walls of the bedroom. Finn went crashing to the ground, Jodi and Edwina immediately running to their side to pull them into a hug. Jodi let Finn tuck their face into his shirt as they wailed like a banshee, mumbling incoherently about Catra was gone.

The world kept passing by, unfazed by how two people had left the mortal world, but Finn’s world had ground to a halt, unable to move past the grief that was swallowing them whole.

Soon, soldiers would take Finn’s mama away, she will join mom six feet below ground, the entire planet will grieve for a day and then move on, but Finn will remain stuck on the last days they spent with their mothers, wondering why they never saw the signs that something was wrong.
