She-Ra the Symbiotic

by Lukaswritesthings

Summary

Adora was normal. Sure, her adoptive mother and her best friend were being really weird lately but that was normal right? And the drug trials seemingly being covered up were normal too? And the weird parasite suddenly living inside her was nor- wait.
Who the hell is Venom?

Adora sighed, resisting the urge to hang up her apron and walk out of the front door of the Circle K.

The work day had been especially slow, even for a gas station in a small town. It had been 7 hours since her shift started - which lasted another hour - and there had been no more than 3 customers, all of them being rude and annoying. Adora was almost glad, though. It was better to have a small amount of rude customers than to have more, she assumed.

Adora tapped her fingers against the counter top, resting her head on her hand as she stared at the T.V in the corner, watching the news. Some small group of teens had vandalized a local family-owned store.

Adora sneered, rolling her eyes. It wasn't the first corner store that had been marked by a group, and she was sure it wouldn't be the last. She feared that the gas station would be next, though her co-worker, Hank - who worked security - assured her that the police would catch the group before they reached the Circle K. Adora wasn't so sure.

She jumped as the front door bell dinged, drawing her attention to the two people walking in.

One of them, a woman, had short hair that was colored pink on the top half and purple on the bottom. She was wearing small shorts that came up to a little above her mid thigh and a loose, dark purple tank top that said "Step Up!" on the front. The other was a man with dark skin and a high-top hair cut. He was wearing a tight, white t-shirt with three black stripes on each sleeve and baggy grey sweatpants.

They spoke quietly as they made there way to the back of the store towards the alcohol. Adora looked at them for a second longer, intrigued by the couple. It only took a few moments and a couple shouts of "Grace!" from the back of the store before the two made their way back up to the front, the man carrying a six pack of Corona.

"ID?" Adora asked as the man placed the beers on the counter. He fished around in his pocket for a moment before pulling out his wallet and handing her his ID.

Beau Moya, 23. Adora clicked her teeth, giving him the card back before ringing up the cases. "$26.54." She heard the girl suck in through her teeth and whisper "Expensive shit," to the man, Beau, as he nodded.

After Adora took the money from him and bid them a good night, the girl hurriedly took the case of beer off the counter, practically pushing the man out the door before looking back over her shoulder and yelling "Have a nice night buff lady!".

They were gone before Adora could even process the words, and the blonde gave a small, confused smirk at the remark. Buff lady, huh?

Adora shivered as the autumn air nipped at her bare skin. The uniform was not suited for colder weather, made obvious by the short sleeves and thin material. The trash bag in her hand felt ten times heavier as she stepped into the nighttime, leaning back in through the emergency exit to yell at her co-worker.

"Hank, don't close this fucking door!" She called, not waiting for a response before locking the door in place and making her way to the industrial garbage cans in the back lot.

The moon light lit the way for her, making Adora weirdly uncomfortable. It was silent, the only thing audible being her footsteps as her Converse thudded lightly on the ground.

The walk to the garbage was short, but Adora stopped when she heard rustling from inside the cans. It shook slightly, making her frown. It wouldn't be the first time a raccoon got stuck inside, she just had to be careful when opening it and make sure the animal got out safely.

Slowly, she stepped forward, placing a hand on the top of the garbage can and beginning to open it. The shaking stopped, and she leaned a bit closer, trying to see inside of the trash can without getting hurt by whatever was in there.

Suddenly, a blob of something dark shot out of the trash, hitting Adora square in the face and knocking her out quickly.

"Hey- hey!" Adora groaned as somebody slapped her, batting their hand away. She felt hot all over and nauseous, as if she had the flu. Her skin felt like it was detached from her body, slimy and constantly moving.

"Wha?" Adora mumbled, slowly opening her eyes.

Hank's face revealed itself above her, concern etched into his eyebrows as he looked at her calculatingly. His short, red hair was messy and looked like it hadn't been brushed in years. He was older, almost 48, but he looked closer to 30.

"You'kay?" He asked her, his southern accent thick. Hank had moved from somewhere in the south a few years back and even being around all the Northerners in Brightmoon hadn't made his accent any thinner.

Adora's eyebrows drew together. Why wouldn't I be?" Her words were slurred as she put a hand on her forehead and sat up, feeling dizzy immediately.

Hank pressed a hand against her chest, pushing her down. "Woah there little lady," He smiled nervously, something unusual on his face. "You look like shit. And I'd suggest you not move for a moment."

Adora swatted his hand away, pressing her fingers into her temples. "N-No, I'm fine, I feel fine, Hank." She assured them both, taking in a deep breath before standing.

Adora swayed, feeling bile rise in her throat before she forced it back down and steadied herself. She glanced around, seeing that they were behind the counter instead of outside. Hank must've carried me back in here.

Hank raised an eyebrow skeptically, his hands hovering around Adora's shoulders. "You sure? At least let me give you a ride home. I don't think I'd feel too great about letting you walk home like this." Adora swallowed, taking in a shaky breath.

Her house was about a mile away and, while that was a cakewalk normally, she was certain she would pass out or puke multiple times on the way back and that would make her late. "I'm fine, Hank. B-But I won't deny that getting a ride back would be great."

Hank scoffed, reaching into his pocket for his keys. "I can imagine it would be. Let me close up and I'll take you home, kid." Adora gave him a grateful, albeit shaky, smile, rubbing the back of her neck. As he walked away, she called him back.

"How long was I out for?" She asked.

Hank gave a shrug, gesturing loosely with his hands. "Ten, fifteen minutes? I don't know how long you were outside exactly. Just saw you on the cameras."

Adora's brow furrowed, and she thanked him. Hank nodded and disappeared behind his office door, leaving Adora alone.

She deflated, leaning against the counter with one hand and placing the other on her forehead. Adora's skin was clammy to the touch, a grimace coming across her face as she wiped her hand off. Looking up, she caught a glimpse of her reflection in the glass window.

Adora paused.

Her skin was paler than she had ever seen it, an almost gray hue. She could see each bead of sweat falling down her face. Adora squinted, hobbling closer to the glass. She leaned in closer to her reflection. Adora's once bright blue eyes seemed duller, closer to a gray than any hue of blue. It startled Adora for a second. Am I really that sick?

Surely not. She never looked like this when she was sick before. Then again, Adora had never had the chance to be sick for more than a day at a time. Supposing she was sick, Adora had never seen a sickness come on so fast. A stomach bug, perhaps? The flu?

Rubbing a hand over her face, Adora turned away from the glass just as Hank exited his office. The man gave her another glance as he locked his door. Hank helped Adora out to his car, bringing a grocery bag out with them just in case she needed to puke.

Although Adora didn't puke, the constant turning and moving of the car made her feel like she should've.

As they pulled into Adora's driveway, Hank stopped the car and turned to look at her. He pursed his lips. "You look worse than before, little lady." He paused for a moment before sighing and opening his door. Adora watched him walk around the car and open her door. The whole world was spinning as the older man helped her out of the low car.

Adora was practically laying on him when they reached the front door. Hank, who's left arm was wrapped around Adora's shoulders, knocked on the front door.

Shit, Adora thought. Cecilia Saxon, the woman who raised Adora and another girl, Catra, was very strict. She wasn't deathly levels of strict, at least not with Adora, but she always required strength. "Anything less than your best is your worst. Never let me see your worst."

To see Adora being held up by somebody she hardly knew? It couldn't happen. Adora pushed herself off Hank just as the door opened.

Cecilia Saxon was a very tall and thin woman. She was pale, an almost sickly color. If Adora looked gray because she was sick, Cecilia might as well have been terminal. Cecilia had long black hair that spanned down from her shoulders to her lower back. She wore a long, almost dress-like piece of clothing. Cecilia had scars covering her face, an especially large one trailing from her eyebrow, around her eye, and through her top lip. When Adora had asked about them years before, Cecilia had narrowed her eyes and sighed.

"Ah, Adora. Curiosity killed the cat, you know?" Her voice lengthened every word as if they were each a question Adora shouldn't answer.

A small, thin child with long blonde hair tilted her head. "But satisfaction brought it back!" Her following smile was bright and proud.

Cecilia stepped towards the child and, with a close to skeletal hand, pat the girl's head. "Not every story ends well, child."

With that, the woman stepped out of the room, leaving Adora alone."

Adora had never gotten anything more about the scars out of the woman.

"Hello?" Cecilia asked before noticing Adora. "Oh, Adora. You never knock. And who is this with you?" Cecilia gave Adora a searching glance before looking to Hank.

"Hello ma'am," Hank smiled. "I'm Hank Myers. I work security at the Circle K. It's nice to meet you." He held out his hand in what was obviously meant to be a polite gesture. Cecilia ignored it, subtly wiping her hand on her dress.

“My name is Cecilia. Why are you accompanying my daughter home? Is something wrong?” Cecilia asked. Her tone could be mistaken for something motherly if Adora didn’t know her, and if she hadn’t caught the narrowed, accusing eyes thrown her way.

Adora looked to the side, her eyes boring holes into Hanks head. She sent him pleading looks that went unnoticed. Please, please say no.

“Don’t worry, Adora just looked somewhat sick. I thought I’d drive her home, just in case she couldn’t make it on her own. I apologize for imposing.” Hank awkwardly let his hand fall as he spoke.

Adora felt the urge to facepalm. Cecilia was definitely going to lecture her about showing weakness in front of strangers later. True to thought, Cecilia's face tensed and her eyebrows drew together.

“Is that so?” Cecilia's tone was colder now, less fake than before. She stepped aside, leaving enough space to comfortably get inside the house. “Well, Adora should come in and get cleaned up then. Wouldn’t want it to get worse.” Adora cringed, stepping forward and walking past Cecilia, into the house.

Hank seemed to get the hint and nodded. “I’ll be off then. Have a nice night ma’am, feel better Adora.” With a tight nod from Adora, Hank turned heel and left, seemingly happier to leave than to stay on their doorstep for any longer.

Ms. Saxon shut the door quickly and spun around, looking at Adora with a raised brow. “So, you’ve forgotten everything I’ve taught you?”

Adora bit her tongue, holding back a biting response. “No, Ms. Saxon. It was a mistake-“

“And I thought I trained that out of you long ago.”

Adora sighed, looking to the ground. She knew there was no way to win this argument, that there was no good answer. Any response that didn't accept full responsibility would be seen as a slight against everything Ms. Saxon stood for.

"I apologize, Ms. Saxon. I-… It was my fault. I'll do better next time." Adora grit her teeth as she said the words.

Looking up, she caught the change in Ms. Saxons face. Adora watched as her expression softened. The woman stepped forward, placing a hand on Adora's cheek and softly rubbing her thumb over Adora's cheekbone.

"Oh Adora, I know you will. I just don't want you to be seen as weak. You'll only be successful if you're strong."

Adora leaned into Ms. Saxons touch, closing her eyes. "I know. Thank you."

Adora resisted the urge to frown as the touch left her face. Ms. Saxon was now facing away from her, busying herself with papers on the kitchen counter. Adora hadn't even noticed that Ms. Saxon had been subtly moving them from the foyer to the kitchen.

"Head to your room for the night. Catrine did the chores for today, so you're clear for the night." Ms. Saxon said. She didn't spare a glance at Adora as she spoke.

Adora felt surprise hit her. "Catra's home?"

For the past few weeks, Catra had been out of the house every time Adora had gotten home. Most times, Ms. Saxon was gone with her. When she wasn't, Ms. Saxon was busier than usual, almost always on the phone with somebody.

Ms. Saxon stopped, turning to Adora. "Yes, Catrine is home. Why wouldn't she be?"

Adora shrugged. The movement brought back a wave of dizziness that Adora forced back down, swallowing the bile that had risen in her throat. “I don’t know. She hasn’t been home lately… Catra’s been out with you, right?” There was a deeper, hidden question. What have you been doing?

Ms. Saxon scoffed. “While she has, I see no reason why you need to know. You pay far too much attention to things you have no part in. What Catra and I do is our business, just like your training is our business. Remember,” Ms. Saxon paused, turning her full body to face Adora. “Curiosity killed the cat, and when satisfaction brought it back…?”

Adora looked down, avoiding Ms. Saxon’s blazing green eyes. “Pride cut off it’s wings.”

After a long lecture from Ms. Saxon, and plenty of well hidden dizzy spells, Adora was more than happy to walk down the hall towards her room. On the way, she passed the shared bathroom and Catra’s room.

Pausing, she pressed her ear to the door. Was Catra awake? They hadn’t talked much in the past few days and Adora wanted to change that. She heard faint music from the room, and, with slight strain, she was happy to hear her friends voice singing along. Adora leaned back and raised a shaky hand to knock on the door.

“Come in!” A voice called, and Adora slowly opened the door.

Catrine – Catra to everyone but Ms. Saxon - Hosker was a lean, somewhat tall woman. She had tan skin with markings slightly darker than her skin tone lining her arms. Thick, brown hair framed her face, gray streaks a sign of constant stress. They had tried to dye it once, but Ms. Saxon was less than pleased.

Catra’s face was similar to Ms. Saxon’s in only one way – they both had scars a-plenty. While Ms. Saxons were large and not able to be hidden, Catra’s were small. The largest was, at most, two inches and was thinner than any of Ms. Saxons. The girl wore them proudly, a sign that she had won every battle she had walked into. Her eyes were the most striking part of her face, one bright blue and the other a shade of green that almost looked yellow.

Catra was sat on the edge of her bed in the far corner of her room. Like Adora's own room, it was mostly bare with only a few personal items. Ms. Saxon detested the idea of the girls having many "earthly possessions", whatever that meant. The bed had beige sheets and comforters and the walls matched the exact shade. The biggest personal item was a poster of Spongebob on the other wall that Catra had gotten when they were kids.

"Adora!" Catra said. A slight, confused smirk tore at her lips. "I didn't know you were home." Adora watched as Catra's eyes glanced over her body. "You feeling alright?"

Adora rolled her eyes exasperatedly. "I'm fine, Catra. How are you? We haven't talked much recently." Adora avoided asking the girl about her seemingly private matters with Ms. Saxon. Pride cut off it's wings.

Catra stretched. Adora grimaced as Catra's back and arms audibly cracked. With a content exhale, Catra replied. "I'm fine, yeah. I've been busy for a while, but I think I'll be less busy soon. Just doing-" She paused. A conflicted look came over her face for a second before she cleared it. "Just doing busy work."

Adora nodded absentmindedly, feeling her head cloud some. "Yeah, I get it." And she did. If Catra's "busy work" was anything like Adora's had been when Ms. Saxon was conditioning her, it was understandable that Catra had been a little distant.

Still, there was a feeling inside Adora, distant but there. It whispered "Wrong, wrong wrong wrong, there's more" and it kept whispering. To Adora's hazy state, however, it might as well have been background noise.

As Adora thought, the two sat in awkward silence for a moment. Adora kicked her feet, glancing at the clock on Catra's nightstand.

"Wow, getting late huh?" Adora said finally. Catra startled, looking to the clock as well.

"Shit, guess it is." Catra pressed a button on the clock and a light on the screen lit up. "I should get to sleep." Catra glanced at Adora, and her voice got softer. "You should get some rest, 'Dor."

Adora's throat clogged with something other than sick-bound mucus and for a moment she couldn't speak. Catra's voice, so soft and thoughtful, always made her feel like this. "Yeah, I uh, I should." She bit her lip. "Night, Cat."

Catra gave her a smile. "Night Adora." Adora gave her one last glance before stepping out and shutting the door.

She hobbled to her room and, once in it, quickly flopped onto her bed. Adora could hardly think about doing her late-night routine at a time where her mind was so hazed. Instead, she closed her eyes, and let the deep confines of sleep grasp her tightly.

Adora awoke at some point in the night with a gasp. Sweat made her work clothes cling to her body, damp and confining. Puke was rising in her throat and if she didn't get to the damn bathroom-

Adora's stomach coiled. Her head spun and the cool ceramic of the showers edge was the only thing keeping her tethered tether tethered*tetheredtethered-* More throwing up and Adora hazily pushed herself off the ground.

The mirror caught her eye as she looked at her reflection for the second time that day. Her skin was no longer the same sickly gray, just her normal paleness. Her eyes were still dull and less blue than she had ever seen them. A slick sheen of sweat covered her skin, and Adora felt tears building in the back of her eyes. Adora's head pounded and dizziness attacked her like it held her heart in it's callous hands. Bringing her own hands to her head, she pressed her palms against her temples. Adora pressed and pressed until the pressure could somewhat distract her from the building headache.

"Stop, stop, stop, stop-" Adora whispered hastily, shaking her head. When the headache didn't stop, she dug her nails in. "Stop it!"

"No."

Everything movement stopped as Adora froze. Her headache, once sharp, had demoted itself to a low, blunt knock in the back of her skull. Her mind, once hazy, had cleared so quickly that Adora flinched from the sudden influx of noises and smells.

"What?" She whispered. Something had whispered. Something low and growly had whispered to her. She whispered back.

"This cannot stop. You were not prepared." There was a low hum that shook Adora to her core. "But you are a good vessel." Was it weird to feel like an intruder in your own body and mind? Adora clutched at her neck, eyes fixated on the mirror.

"I'm going insane. I'm literally hearing voices." Adora's own voice sounded questionable at best. The hum came back before the back of her neck felt like it was literally coming off-

Adora tried to scream, tried to make any sound at all, but her throat was clogged with something other than an unidentifiable sentimentality. Panic overtook her, only getting worse when she saw the source of the pain.

There was a thick, viscous substance coming out of the back of her neck. It formed into a round blob of moving substance farther from her body. Eyes (?) made themselves out of nothing as a grim, toothy smile tore itself through the blob.

"Hello. Do not make a sound." The voice that came out of the was haunting. Adora choked on the substance but nodded hastily, pleading with her eyes for air.

Almost instantly, her throat cleared. Air forced itself into her lungs as Adora sputtered and coughed, gasping.

“Shit, you are not impaired, are you?” The, thing, spoke, sounding concerned. Oddly.

“What the fuck are you?” Adora said between gasps. Her hand stayed on her throat, massaging life back into the nerves.

“Long story or short story?” It chuckled.

Adora felt an indescribable anger come through her. “Cut the shit!” The thing jolted before wiggling its way through the air and stationing in front of her face. There was an intense stare down before the thing spoke, showing off its sharp teeth.

“I am Venom. We, are Venom. I am a Symbiote that was brought here by accident.” It, Venom, paused. “I do not know who or what brought me here. But I am here.”

“What the hell do you mean? Symbiote?” Adora asked.

“I live off others life force. You exist, I exist. Simple.” Venom replied. It said it like it was the most casual thing in the world.

“How long have you been on Earth? How have you been… existing?” Adora asked. Was it killing people? Is that what living off others life force meant? Was it going to kill her?

Venom hummed, vibrating her whole body. “I do not know how long. Your sun has set many times since I came here. I have been feasting off others, but not killing them. I think it’s unnecessary.” It paused only to smirk. “I am hungry though. I will not eat you, however. You are a good vessel. Every other body is exceptionally weak, but you hold real power. I believe we can strike a… deal.” Adora felt that anger rise again.

“Fuck you. Fuck you, fuck you! What the fuck.” While she would usually refrain from the constant cursing, it felt suitable for the situation. “What-“ Adora swiftly dropped to her knees and hugged closely to the toilet, dry heaving.

There was a parasite on her body. A parasite that could talk and wanted to feed off her. What. The. Fuck.

It took a while for Adora to calm down, and even then she still held onto some of her panic.

About 30 minutes later, she sat back in her bedroom. Adora’s condition had improved immensely. She was no longer sweating and her head felt less like an active war zone and more like a quiet dome. Well, quiet except for the constant voice of Venom.

“So, the deal?” He asked.

Adora sighed, swiping her hands over her face. “What deal?”

Venom wriggled, something Adora was coming to learn meant he was trying to copy a human “so-so” gesture. “What do you humans say? An eye for an eye? I’ll keep you safe and help you out here and there, if you supply me with safety and food.” Venom wiggled again, moving up and down rapidly. “Yep, seems good to me.”

Adora’s eye twitched. “And if I say no?”

Venom stopped moving. Adora felt a random wave of disappointment. “Do not. I will kill you.” Adora’s face twisted with disgust. No choice then, huh?

Venom shook from side to side. “Nope.”

Adora stopped mid movement, her hand halfway to her face. She looked up at Venom, feeling the substance he was made of shift in the back of her neck. “Don’t tell me you can read my fucking mind.” Was her one privacy really taken?

Venom chuckled, and Adora felt amusement tickle at her chest. “I cannot read your mind. It’s a sense, a feeling you could say. You heard my voice earlier, did you not? If you want me to, I can hear yours. I feel your emotions, too. Only a little bit, though. I assume it will get stronger with time.”

Adora shivered. How the hell was she going to hide this? A constant voice in her head, another emotional being inside her mind at all times of the damn day? Sure, she could hide her own emotions from Ms. Saxon, but Venoms?

Venom twisted his head(?). “Ms. Saxon? Is she that woman from before?” He shook his head. “I do not like her. Can I eat her?”

“What?” Adora asked, taken aback. “No, no you can NOT eat Ms. Saxon.” Adora waved her hands wildly before they landed on her knees. “You cannot eat ANYBODY.”

"You cannot stop me."

"Uh, it's my body, I think I can."

"Nuh uh."

"Oh my god."
