Yearning

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/42290127.

Rating:
Teen And Up Audiences

Archive Warning:
No Archive Warnings Apply

Category:
Gen

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationships:
Norwyn & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Light Hope & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Horde Prime & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra)

Characters:
Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Norwyn (She-Ra), Horde Prime (She-Ra), Light Hope (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Shadow Weaver PoV, mild on screen death, Blood, Blood Drinking, Light Spinner and her very bad horrible no good decision making, she had decent reasons but this was not the path to take, Casual Racism, Racism, Alternate Universe - Bloodborne Fusion, Don't Have to Know Bloodborne (Video Game), Inspired by Bloodborne (Video Game), what's that? more exposition? oh boy!, no editing we die like meh, Emotional Manipulation, Manipulation, Alcohol Abuse/Alcoholism, Implied/Referenced Drug Addiction, Implied/Referenced Drug Use, look is she even Shadow Weaver if she isn't addicted to magic and alcohol?

Language:
English

Series:
Part 2 of We are born of the blood

Stats:
Published: 2022-10-10 Words: 5,206 Chapters: 1/1

Yearning

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/42290127.

Rating:
Teen And Up Audiences

Archive Warning:
No Archive Warnings Apply

Category:
Gen

Fandom:
She-Ra and the Princesses of Power (2018)

Relationships:
Norwyn & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Light Hope & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Horde Prime & Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra)

Characters:
Shadow Weaver | Light Spinner (She-Ra), Norwyn (She-Ra), Horde Prime (She-Ra), Light Hope (She-Ra)

Additional Tags:
Shadow Weaver PoV, mild on screen death, Blood, Blood Drinking, Light Spinner and her very bad horrible no good decision making, she had decent reasons but this was not the path to take, Casual Racism, Racism, Alternate Universe - Bloodborne Fusion, Don't Have to Know Bloodborne (Video Game), Inspired by Bloodborne (Video Game), what's that? more exposition? oh boy!, no editing we die like meh, Emotional Manipulation, Manipulation, Alcohol Abuse/Alcoholism, Implied/Referenced Drug Addiction, Implied/Referenced Drug Use, look is she even Shadow Weaver if she isn't addicted to magic and alcohol?

Language:

English

Series:
Part 2 of We are born of the blood

Stats:
Published: 2022-10-10 Words: 5,206 Chapters: 1/1

Yearning

by Nny11

Summary

Light Spinner's descent started, as so many things do, with only the best of intentions.

Notes

See the end of the work for notes

It had to be said, without any frills, bells, or whistles that the entire world had severely underestimated Etheria.

Not just their disbelief in the good blood, but of her people. Light Spinner had seen them, hard to avoid such caricature when traveling from city to city. Depictions of them as savages, half animal and dripping with blood. Stylized in newspapers to look like demons stealing babies from cradles, mascots for various taverns who wanted to create a morbid atmosphere, even ticketed for a dark ride at a carnival once. Oh yes. She had seen them.

"Interested in trying something on the wild side, eh?" A jolly woman asked when Spinner had frozen in front of a display case selling tiny bottles of heavily diluted blood. A red eyed wolf man snarled down at her, pointing towards the wares that were marked up so heavily that she'd actually done a double take.

She sneered behind her veil at the cut out of a "hunter" on the other side of the display wielding a woodcutters axe. "The wild side?"

"Oh yes, this is real blood from Etheria, bless their souls! I don't partake of such things myself, but plenty of customers asked me to stock it so here it is." The woman either was an idiot or playing one very convincingly. "They get it fresh from their dead before using the bodies for their dark arts, you know."

Magic tingled at her finger tips and whispers from the cosmos dripped honey into her ears. But Light Spinner pushed away the call. Violence would only play into their perception of Etherians, anger or hurt or upset would too. There were no moves she could make that would bring her any satisfaction without causing more trouble than it was worth.

"I'm afraid you are incorrect madam." Light Spinner made sure to keep her voice light and warm, the same one she used when teaching children at the college. "We get the blood from below the city itself. You can find it in small pools or drips down there, and once collected it is treated to ensure nothing unsavory remains in the blood itself. We do not eat our dead."

The woman paled, mouth flapping open several times before uttering one last stupid sentence, " You're an Etherian!? My apologies love, your comportment is simply wonderful! Very well spoken."

That's how it always went. Ignorant peoples making outrageous statements without a care in the world for the crumbling city they seemed to love and hate.

As always, she'd smiled thinly with a nod before leaving.

Yes, the world underestimated what should have been the crown jewel of the modern age. More than happy to let aggressors attack them over and over, never letting them breath long enough to dream of catching up to the technologies they seemed to value so highly.

She would know, being an orphan of the last war brought to their doorstep.

Her parents had died fighting back against the incursion made by Queen Angella and Brightmoon's angel bloods. Light Spinner had been sent to Mystacor for protection, the college's neutral stance ensured greater safety and she had discovered a great potential for the arcane within herself. So great that Provost Norwyn himself had taken interest, a boon and curse as it opened many does to magical artifacts and tomes even as he stopped her extracurricular studies in swordsmanship and healing.

She had planned to run away to the front lines after all, and while blood infused bullets were wonderful little creations they were impossible to make when fighting for one's life. Light Spinner had pushed herself to the point of exhaustion to work in private, growing her powers and diligently continuing her approved studies, only for Queen Angella to call her people back.

Once again leaving the bitter dregs of humanity left to rebuild their ruined city, and cutting Spinner's entire life adrift.

Such was the great tragedy of the grand city, that people from far and wide would arrive with their armies to ransack and destroy them but never had the will or power to hold Etheria for themselves. And so they were forced to rebuild over and over again, never moving forward as every few generations a large chunk of their population was murdered. The act itself was revolting, but it was the callousness and lies that drove Spinner to madness.

No matter where she went, the people would ask, shocked and appalled and ready to hear gruesome tales from a barbaric Etherian themself. And after the first few times she had learned to model herself off of the foreigners who studied temporarily alongside her. It did wonders to make these gawkers shrink back, when she held a mirror up to their own savagery.

The woman at that shop had not been unique, not even the last one she'd seen on that particular trip. The World Library provided a momentary calm, a place where her weapon and magic was no cause of concern, and any artifact she requested to borrow for the college was provided happily without comment. It was her main duty as Provost Norwyn's student to provide that which he deemed best for Mystacor, and many of the things he wished to study were pulled from the Library.

It burned a little, each and every one of them had been found beneath Etheria, and she knew they could find more if allowed into the deeper portions but the provost was quick to rebuke any ambition or drive of her own.

That particular trip had been to retrieve a black eye rumored to still be functional, and in return she carried a few paltry cold blood shards. So at least her own little "con" allowed her a measure of peace until she had left and once more been forced back into a reality in which her well maintained dress and even speech was seen as exceptional due to the blood in her veins.

Truly, she thought as her carriage passed a market stall fit to burst with "genuine" Etherian goods and blood, their obsession with blood was disgusting. Misguided at best, manipulative at worst, and always misused regardless. The way they demonized the good blood while coveting it for themselves made her furious. They would cry about cannibalism and protecting their children, only to buy expensive bottles of cure all's and tonics imported from Etheria directly. The only thing she could see as a silver lining was taking money those who sought to destroy their homes to rebuild them once again.

It was the only reason anyone wanted to take Etheria by force, after all, and Light Spinner was sick to death of it.

The perversion of something so sacred was despicable. But money was always louder than faith.

And so she would leave the college and see the world, suffer its indignities, and return home once more with new suggestions to help show everyone how wrong they had been. Learning was always her greatest desire and comfort, but teaching was truly a joy. In quiet corners with those she could trust, reading from science and math books with new kinds and types. Spells that did not need arcane tools, glyphs that required no blood. The orphans of Mystacor had long practiced their weaponry against one another, training in the shadows where Provost Norwyn would not think to look for them, and each new item or technique she brought only honed their skills further. What she taught would finally save Etheria, pushing the city and her people out of the loop of death that gripped them and returning the blood to its rightful place in service to the greater good instead of as a cheap commodity to be exploited.

If her mentor had any sense left in his ancient head, Light Spinner would have happily held seminars and lecture series to teach all she had learned to every scholar inside their bustling halls.

Foreigners would return home and speak of how Etherians were at the bleeding edge of technology, and Etherians themselves would return to the city and pull everyone up. The Mystacor College of Magic may be neutral and technically was not part of Etheria proper, but their proximity made it impossible to uncouple them from the city that birthed them.

She just needed him to listen to her, to trust her, to just give her a single chance!

"We don't need it."

Light Spinner forced herself to keep pace, her old mentor might have one foot in the grave but the man was as fast as he was hard headed. And his nimbleness only seemed to increase when he wished to flee any discussion on how to improve their own lives. It seemed preposterous to her that even when her suggestions were limited, short sighted, and only for the college itself that he would refuse her. She would simply need to impress upon him how this small change could positively impact the institution he clung to so fiercely.

"Provost Norwyn, is it not worth our while to become more self-sufficient? We keep the secrets of the catacombs and pay dearly for prospectors, but if we were to teach more of the students how to defend themselves we-"

"Spinner!" Norwyn's rebuke burned as it always did, and the way his face softened only salted the wound. Oh yes, he had no issue with ignoring her intelligence of maturity, treating her as if she was still a small child clinging to his robes. “Light, please, we are a college of learning and magic, not sword play and blood. Meditate on what it is you wish to accomplish, and work towards one goal. One. You’ve not yet finished your arcane studies and now you wish to bring violence within our walls? We are not an academy for hunters. You need to focus! No more of this nonsense, please. You have great potential, try to achieve it instead of chasing these fantasies. Mystacor is not Etheria, we do not fight , Light.”

He sighed and rubbed at his forehead before waving her away. “I have lessons to teach, please attend to your own and we can speak more later my dear.”

She’d waited until he was well out of sight and ear shot, muttering petulantly to herself, “I have lessons to teach, as backwards and ancient as myself!”

That was the way of it though. Nineteen and old enough to be solely responsible for the most dangerous and valuable artifacts at the college, but in Provost Norwyn’s mind she was forever a ward of the college. If she could use all her skills, Light Spinner would graduate from the college with records beat and no equal to match her, but restricted by old fashioned teachings instead she was merely a student. Ready to be cast aside if expelled, directly onto the streets without any security net to aid her.

Norwyn certainly would be of no help. He cared only for results that he wished to see, and despite his promise to teach her and nurture her talents he seemed to do little and less each day. Light Spinner couldn’t help but wonder somedays, feeling helpless and trapped as she flipped through his old books listlessly, why he’d even bothered to take her on if all he would do was hamstring her.

When he'd first decided to mentor her, the provost had seemed impressed by her work. Quicker and more clever than her peers, Light Spinner had advanced rapidly and her dedication had been noticed. Norwyn had called her to his office on her thirteenth birthday to offer her his mentorship, and perhaps she should have known better that to accept based solely on what he promised her at the start.

"You must understand this, to study under me is to choose the most difficult of paths." He'd told her at their first private session. "I will give no quarter, allow no mistakes, and press for more when you believe you have nothing left to give. I do not show favoritism simply because you are learning from me directly, if anything I will deny you more than the rest and expect you to keep up. Am I understood?"

She had been practically vibrating with excitement and energy at his selection and desperate to prove herself worthy of it. The folly of youth was to be hopeful and optimistic. Spinner had believed it would be hard, but that she would prevail and join her parents fighting the angel bloods. The war ended, her parents died, her studies fell behind as Norwyn delegated more and more of his own duties to her, and then when she tried to push more to show she was ready he seemed ready to be rid of her. Instead of teaching her, he merely sent her out on the long trips and errands that he disliked himself.

Learn from him. Ha!

What had she learned from him? Next to nothing. She'd refilled his tonics and brought his pipe, she'd carried all sorts of tomes and reagents that she'd not been allowed to partake in herself. She'd even gone into the basement once, where the advanced scholars worked in pitch blackness. They'd no need for light when each and every one of them had carved their own eyes out of their heads. Her lantern had revealed the jars filled with the discarded organs and her own stomach turned as she quietly walked among them to see what they learned from their eyes on the inside only to discover the books they read and worked from were empty.

Worthless. The Provost was worthless, and got his kicks from bullying children and those foolish enough to listen to him.

Focus? On what? Outdated methodology or on being so insular as to be worthless? She was done trying to focus!

Instead of listening to him once more, Light Spinner did something rash.

She had walked the forest the rest of the day, hiking back to the city until she could find a bar to drink something stronger than Merry May's Miracle Elixir. She wanted something with a kick; if it couldn't cure the sickness in her heart, then at least it would be enjoyable. She had been nursing her third tonic when a woman sat down across from her.

She was tall, even taller than Spinner herself, with platinum blonde hair peaking out from under her hood. Proudly displayed over her chest was the prospectors mark.

"It is unusual to find a mage out here." The woman seemed to think that was an appropriate opener.

"No more unusual than it is rude to interrupt a stranger."

The woman smiled, small and sharp and calculating. Her ghost eyes sparkling with excitement. "Are we now? I have worked with Master Norwyn several times and seen you by his side."

"I'm afraid I must have been too busy cleaning his shoes to notice." Spinner grumbled more to the table than the woman, before trying to pull her addled mind together and behave more maturely. "Is there something I can help you with, prospector?"

"Light Hope," the woman smiled, "Prospector Light Hope, instructor and trainer of new hunters. And I think it may be the other way around. I've heard from a few colleagues that you've been working diligently on your swordsmanship. A curious skill for a mage, but useful for a hunter."

Perhaps it was the drinks, blood was more potent and addictive than any alcohol and she had very generously chosen to combine the two. Perhaps it was her pettiness rearing its ugly head. Perhaps it was even the way the woman held out a slim cane for her inspection, revealing the thin blade inside that hummed with magical energies. The whole world tilted on its side as she realized this was an opportunity, one that could finally put her in a position to actually help instead of twiddle her thumbs all day.

"Tell me more."

They'd spoken late into the night and even into the next day. Walking and talking across the city as Hope showed her a few entrances to the catacombs that Spinner knew the College taught no longer existed. She did not care that her duties went unfulfilled, or that Norwyn was likely bleating about trying to find her. The impotent rage she felt over the lies being revealed, the abuse of power on display kept her moving. A fire inside her that she'd feared lost after seven years wasted. She couldn't care at all about the life she'd been living, as awful and hopeless as it had been.

What Spinner cared about was the way descending into the labyrinth itself felt to her with the cane whip clutched tightly in her hand for the very first time. The magic she found begging to be taken and used instead of sitting stagnated in pools. The way Light Hope had eagerly and easily agreed to let her actually work and teach as she saw fit with a promise that she would never have to work with Mystacor directly unless she so desired it.

The next week when she officially joined the prospectors, Light Spinner would learn her choice was an unusual weapon for one of them. Too elegant and delicate for most of their tastes, the cane whip was really for a more sophisticated and bygone era. Where she feared once more being thrust outside and broken promises, instead the squadron happily learned from her how to best use it.

Asking questions and incorporating technique into their own hammers, axes, and more. In return they helped her learn how to fight against more aggressive opponents, a few of them offered her papers filled with fire and lightning to test. She taught them better ways to heal, magic, and even some philosophy and history about the world they knew so well below, and they taught her more practical applications of her knowledge. Every day was an excursion and a challenge with like minded people.

A push and pull, that brought them all higher and higher.

A year passed, and then two, and her fellow hunters gave her knowing looks as she continued further and deeper. Curiosity driving her to stay underground longer and longer.

It was dangerous how addicting it was to delve below. A sacrament taken too frequently became less holy as she carved her way through the creatures below her own beloved city. Many she had seen like the corpses infected by bad blood, but some were giant celestial monsters she'd never imagined in her wildest dreams. Strange many legged flowers that were ripe for harvest once killed. The secrets of each chalice revealed to her according not to her age or time spent, but aptitude and ability. The prospectors never stopped her, encouraging her instead. Accepting her and praising her. Together, as if gripped by madness they swiftly aided her. Wild eyed, pale and sweating, they gave her what they found when she surfaced and cheered as she left once more to go farther.

It was exquisite. To grow so rapidly, to teach so much, to know her discoveries made life in Etheria safer as Light Hope spoke with other hunters.

And yet, strangely, it became a mere bonus on top of learning how to tap into the wells of magic that existed deep underground. Provost Nowin had refused to let them delve deep enough to find the very thing that could be the college's salvation. Light Spinner had been giddy to realize she could one day return stronger and more powerful than him, with guarantees and not empty promises. So she pulled and she drank, greedily filling bottles with pure blood until the arteries ran dry. Meditating and focused, she could feel the urge that no doubt had plagued the blind scholars of Mystacor to tear out her own eyes to see more. To see further into the cosmos.

She refused it, kept her sight as she worked, losing all track of time and space but never forgetting her purpose. To return to Mystacor and Etheria with the power to save them all. To teach all she had learned instead of hoarding it like precious jewels.

And there was always more to learn. More to learn. Always more to learn. She just had to go a little deeper each time, kill a few more monsters each time, hone her skills and her mind. Meditating and focused with the thrumming power and lifeblood of the city. Always more. And before she knew it years had passed with her far below the ground, straining at her limit and feeling half mad as she finally considered returning to the place and people she'd considered gods sent until she realized how fast she would be on her own.

In truth she had nearly forgotten her life on the surface when Light Hope perished.

Light Spinner had felt a tugging, like a calling and had finally come up for air. It had felt like waking from a fever dream to return to the prospector's compound to delighted cheers and a warm welcome home. To shower and wash her clothes, sleep in a real bed and eat fresh food and water. It was like becoming human again, and she'd been excited to share all she'd learned with Light Hope. The woman had never been her mentor, not the way Norwyn had, but she had been the reason Spinner had flourished.

"She's guiding that new'in from the college, what's his face?" Ollin spat on the ground, thinking furiously through the haze of inebriation. "The pretty boy, fucking asshole that he is! She'll be back soon, always is!"

But she did not.

The man who had hired her, a foreign scholar who reeked of strange arcane powers, had at least carried her badge back. Apologizing profusely and lamenting, "It's a shame the college does not teach us proper defense, I would have gladly leapt to aid her."

It had been difficult to take the badge, the loss of a dear friend she had not appreciated enough in life hurt and compounded under the tension of the unknown. She wanted a distraction and he'd been so kind as to provide one. So Spinner snorted, "You know, I once told Provost Norwyn that myself before leaving the college."

“Oh?” He’d smiled, open and trusting. And perhaps she should have questioned how he’d known to say anything to her at all, but at the time it felt quite natural. “You must be Light Spinner. I am Horde Prime, soon to be provost. I would love to speak more with you.”

“Soon to be- what do you mean?”

“You haven’t heard?” He asked, face becoming guarded as he clearly debated what to tell her. “Well, I suppose not, not down here. I have been doing my best to change the college since my acceptance and have gathered quite a few mages and scholars who are interested in growing ourselves. Your name has been quite popular amongst them. I called a vote of no confidence last month, and was elected to take over as provost myself.”

Oh that burned . Spinner had trained most of her life for that position, only for some stranger to waltz in and snatch it from her. It filled her with pure rage that logic could not calm. It did not matter that she had left, it did not matter that she had spent the last two years underground. That had been hers, hers by right! She had trained for it, and even as a hunter she had prepared for her inevitable return to lead. It was unfair! Gods, it was unfair!

“I see.” She ground out, clutching Hope’s badge hard enough that she cut herself on it’s edge.

“Do you?” He smiled once again. “You know, I am quite new to the college. I had already planned to bring back the position of Chancellor, and, well, I know this is presumptive of me, but would you be interested in returning full time? The college is changing, and we could use someone with your vision to guide us."

It was perfect. Too perfect. She'd learned, oh she'd learned over the years in the dark of the catacombs, to never trust something that seemed too good to be true.

"Not to be crass, I know she has only just returned to the earth," Prime started almost cautiously, "but I do not see much of a future for the prospectors without her here, do you?"

No. Her fellow hunters had become complacent without her there to shepherd them along, lazy without her firm guidance. Without Light Hope the only hope they had was within Light Spinner herself, but would they even accept that? She was relatively new and to those newer than her she was unknown, a soul they'd thought lost to madness. Hope had always believed in her, but she was dead and the only thing that truly made her wish to remain a hunter was now gone.

It was a crossroads. She could remain a hunter and take control of the prospectors entirely. Change their teachings, bend them to her will, scout further and deeper and push them towards magic. It would not be easy to force them into greatness. With a lack of hiring in recent times, the whole of their faction had slowly turned to looting the tunnels they'd sworn to protect. Their addiction to blood had only grown out of control. Would they be willing to give up their idle lives now for what they'd once craved? Light Spinner wasn't sure.

Of course, she could return to the college, as an equal to the man in charge. With resources and money, and backing to do what should have been done years and years before. No need to force, if what Prime said was true, the college would willingly follow them. She would still have access to the catacombs, to the blood and the magic she needed to further her research and studies. It was where she'd always meant to return to, the place where she could do the most good. Without Light Hope to speak with hunters like Mara, Padinus, and Mercia there was no way to share all she had. It was such a neat little package, perfectly presented at the perfect time. Very suspicious.

"A combined front could be powerful, indeed." She hedged. "Now what aren't you telling me?"

For a moment he looked surprised, and then his smile became much colder. "Well, well, well, there's more to you than I expected. Very good Light Spinner. I am not an Etherian, and I do not hold the sway that you already do. Together I believe we can find a wellspring of magic by having the prospectors under Mystacor, and the college under our thumbs. Alone I can still achieve these gains, but it would be much simpler with your help. I know you've all but lived beneath the city for far too long to have not found something worth your while and equal or greater to your magical prowess. In a way, I seek to use you to achieve my ends, but our goals seem well aligned." He chuckled then, "Despite what that old goat says, sometimes the best path is the easiest one. You need not answer me today…simply consider it, hmm?"

The itch to go back into the catacombs intensified. The shaking and dizziness from losing access to the thick and foaming blood of the lowest levels made it difficult to to think. But she persisted, unwilling to become as lowly as the rest. Light Spinner quietly made her rounds and took stock of her options, letting her head clear from the deep magic as she considered which option was best.

But she had never had patience for false dichotomies.

Choose one thing? There was no need. Light Spinner had smiled behind her veil as Horde Prime reintroduced her to the college, and allowed her to escort Norwyn off the property herself. Why choose only one, when she could have it all? She walked him part way through the woods, letting him ramble and beg, pleading with her now that she had all the power. Where once he had looked down at her, now he looked to her for salvation. Why limit herself when her own power was limitless?

“Please, Light, the things he plans for the college will be disastrous for all! You must see that he is an evil man with selfish, horrible plans! They will do nothing but harm!”

“Well of course they will,” she’d huffed at him, making sure to use the same inflection he always had when she’d made a mistake born from ignorance when he’d refused to teach her properly, “he’s no Etherian and we all know what they want Master Norwyn.”

“Then why help him!?” Back was the attitude, the snarling old man who thought he could now have his way. Norwyn thought himself now in charge of the conversation, believed himself stronger than her. Still truly believing that the only path forward was caution and moderation instead of innovation and progress.

Oh, it made her blood boil.

For a moment she breathed in the decay and sweetness of the labyrinth. A flash of the night sky twinkled in the corner of her eyes as the universe whispered its benedictions to her. Poor old Norwyn, he'd been too stubborn to change his ways, to give her even the slightest of chances to show him better. It took, perhaps, ten seconds to sink her sword through his chest, another twenty to bend down and quickly take anything of value off his person for her own use. Unable to do much more than gasp in the face of her attack.

She stared down at his body for a few minutes, waiting to see if she felt much of anything for it.

But of course the surly bastard couldn't even let her enjoy her revenge.

Instead she turned to the artifacts he had tried to smuggle out of the college. A shell, an eye, and even a few bottles of blue elixir and sedatives. The eye called to her, whispered as she picked it up before realizing it was the last thing she had ever fetched from the outside for him. Spinner watched a nebula swirl across its iris and smiled.

Ah well, she was used to being disappointed by Norwyn, and there was a bright future ahead of her. Very bright indeed. If she played her cards right, Prime and whatever nefarious plans he held for Etheria could be stopped from the inside out. She was so tired of rebuilding, after all.

"One more time," She promised herself as she turned and began to hike back to the college. She left his body out for the scavengers she'd already paid to clean up after her. Corpses were plentiful these days but hard to come by as everyone began to lock up their dead, and the gods still needed their sacrifices. "One more time."

She slipped the eye into her pocket and stepped through the blue and purple tinted mist towards the college, smiling at the refreshing cold that washed over her.

End Notes

I've got /maybe/ one more chapter for this fic but I might skip it or work it into another fic/series.

Anyhow, in case you were wondering if living 100% underground and surviving off of rotted blood and pure magic was a good idea or not, I'm thinking we should mark it as a Not Good. Light Spinner really was on a path born from good intentions and it all just quickly got away from her.

And it's only going to get worse when the Healing Horde is finally formed...

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!